Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The bill we have before us, which has the designation S. 685, is the bill as it passed the Senate. Am I correct or not correct in saying that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors struck out all that bill and substituted an entirely new one?

Mr. COLMER. I would not answer that affirmatively. Some changes have been made, but the general thought has been followed.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOOK. Can the gentleman tell me what this bill will accomplish besides appropriating $300,000 for the necessary expenses of the division administering the problem and $700,000 to be distributed to the States?

Mr. COLMER. I believe if the gentleman from Michigan will examine closely into that he will find that the figures to which he refers for appropriations were in the Senate bill and are not in the House bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the differences of opinion that might arise over this very complicated and perplexing problem. After considerable study of this subject, I am constrained to believe, however, that this is the proper approach to the subject. And in this connection I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that this bill represents the views of the very learned and distinguished gentleman from Texas, the able and highly respected chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives. It is to be regretted most sincerely that Judge MANSFIELD is ill and unable to be here in person to pilot this bill, on which he has been working for a long number of years, through the House. I am sure that many of us who are less conversant with this problem than the gentleman from Texas are the more appreciative of the fine work and the extended study that he gave to this legislation before it received his final approval and the approval of his able committee.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I express the opinion of the entire House when I express the hope that Judge MANSFIELD'S illness will be of a short duration, and that he will soon occupy his accustomed place among his colleagues who love and appreciate him so dearly. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, the problem of what to do with the pollution of the public waters of America is not a new one. It has been before this body in one form or another for at least 5 years. The fact that we are again confronted with legislation to remedy the pollution of the navigable waters of America is in itself good testimony to the fact that individual initiative and private industry alone will not solve the problem. Needed is some kind of stimulus from the Federal Government.

About 5 years ago—in December of 1934, to be exact—a conference was held, known as the Dern-Lonergan conference, to decide what attitude the conservation groups of America should take toward this increasingly serious problem of pollution. Out of that conference grew what is known in the history of this legislation as the Lonergan bill, introduced by Senator Lonergan, of Connecticut. That was introduced in the Seventy-fourth Congress, in January of 1936. At that time I was an official in the Izaak Walton League, which was a primary sponsor of the Dern-Lonergan conference, and I have been personally familiar with all antipollution legislation since proposed. Long before coming to Congress, I was active in sponsoring clean-streams legislation.

Since 1936 numerous other bills have been introduced from time to time dealing with the problem of pollution, and today we find ourselves as legislators representing constituents divided into three different camps, and we, ourselves, are divided into three different camps from the standpoint of the duties which we have as the legislative part of the Government considering the problem of pollution.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Who is the author of the bill we are presently considering? As I understand, it is a Senate bill.

Mr. MUNDT. It is S. 685, and it was introduced by Senator BARKLEY.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I believe the gentleman means to be correct, but the bill we are considering this afternoon is the bill that has been reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as a substitute for the Barkley bill, and it strikes out everything after the enacting clause.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I understand that, but I wanted to know who originated the legislation in the Senate.

Mr. MUNDT. There have been some changes made in committee; that is quite correct. But, in substance, it is still the same S. 685 introduced in the Senate by Senator BARKLEY.

Some of us, I am sure, recognize that pollution is a national problem, as has every intelligent survey which has been made of the problem, which has almost been surveyed to death; that is, to the death of clean streams, not to the death of pollution by any means.

In the first place, it is recognized, I believe, by conservationists and State health groups as well, that there must be some national assistance and some national stimulus if we seriously mean to solve the problem of pollution. Among those who recognize this point of view there are two schools of thought. There is the school of thought represented by the Barkley bill and by the committee substitute for the Barkley bill, that the approach should be primarily one of study and gentle encouragement on the part of the Federal Government, by appropriating money for surveys, and for the making of plans, by the encouragement of interstate compacts, and by the assistance of such Federal financing as is possible either through grants or through reduced interest rates.

The present version of the bill before us provides nothing for grants, because that has been deleted from the original Barkley bill. Generally speaking, it represents the school of thought that the Federal Government should simply provide encouragement and leadership in the solution of a problem which for 150 years has manifestly remained unsolved. It does nothing in its present form to outlaw pollution—past, present, or future.

The other school of thought, the school of thought to which I personally belong and the school of thought reflected and represented by conservation organizations of America—in fact, every major conservation organization of America is a member of this school of thought—feels that the Federal Government should do more than simply encourage the correction of pollution, should do more than make possible the formation of interstate compacts, and should do more than to offer reduced interest rates to groups to correct their nefarious practices.

Among these conservation organizations which believe that this Congress should take a definite forward step resulting in something constructive in the way of eliminating and controlling pollution are the Izaak Walton League of America, the American Wildlife Federation, the American Wildlife Institute, the American Forestry Association, the American Audubon Society, the American Association for the Advancement of Science; and I could name others of like significance and like importance.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, these organizations which have devoted a major portion of two decades to studying the problem of pollution control have some pretty good reasons to substantiate their point of view that simply permitting voluntary eradication of pollution will never cure the problem.

Now, between these two schools of thought, or associated with them, is another one, which openly supports the position that they believe the Federal Government should do nothing about the problem. They do not offer a solution, although they cannot deny that the inevitable law of gravity compels streams to cross State lines, and consequently stream pollution becomes an interstate problem; but, winking both eyes against that fact, they blandly say, "We believe it is a function for the States without any assistance, without any regulation, without any laws emanating from the Federal Government."

I am not just sure about the position of the speaker preceding me; I do not believe he belongs to that school, but I did hear some statements made by someone engaging him in a colloquy leading me to believe that perhaps the gentleman from California belongs to that school.

Let me show you how futile that school of thought actually is. Last week I had the opportunity of going into the Old Dominion State of Virginia to help commemorate Washington's Birthday at the place where Washington had his home, and, waiting for my turn to go on the program, I picked up a copy of a Virginia newspaper, the Daily Advance, published in Lynchburg, Va., and here it is for Thursday evening, February 22, 1940, discussing our problem of pollution. The headline says: "Lichford urges no action on stream pollution now"; and then the article tells us that Mayor Lewis E. Lichford left for Richmond, the capital of Virginia, to appear before the Virginia Legislature to urge that no antipollution legislation be passed by the State of Virginia in this session.

There is no reason, is there, for a State like Virginia to pass antipollution legislation unless the other States housing competitive industries pass similar legislation? And, quite frankly in his home-town paper, the mayor of Lynchburg says that the commission that he represents "does not want to work a hardship on the industries in Virginia or on the cities either. The commission has been interested in getting new industries in Virginia and hopes to induce more to come, so we can't be too hasty about the matter"; that is, the matter of eliminating pollution.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am very pleased to yield to my friend and my cosponsor of the cost-of-production farm program.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I would like to be informed by the gentleman just what the essential difference is between the so-called Izaak Walton League bill and this Senate bill 685, if that is the bill we are discussing now.

Mr. MUNDT. The essential difference, I can say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, is the difference between the two schools of thought which I have pictured thus far: the one which feels that it should be left primarily to the States to solve the problem with some Federal encouragement in the form of an appropriation to provide opportunities to study and investigate the problem and work out remedial measures and to encourage State compacts; and the other, the Izaak Walton League position, is that the Federal Government should go further and should do something to provide for national uniformity in antipollution legislation, so that States advertising to the world that they want to bring industries within their bounds because there is no antipollution legislation there, will be prohibited from such an iniquitous attempt to bring industries from States correcting their pollution problems into States that do not correct them. We feel that the protection of honest, pollution-correcting industries is more imperative, if you please, than the protection of pollution-offending industries. The present system penalizes the clean industries and rewards the unclean.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Has the gentleman a copy of any amendment that he would propose to offer to what the committee is recommending?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes.

Mr. TABER. So that we may know what the issue may be, will he please discuss it?

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the gentleman. I just want to say this before mentioning the amendment, that I know some of you have received letters and telegrams, perhaps, from conservation organizations urging you to vote for or against the so-called Barkley bill or to vote for or against the so-called Mundt bill, and some of you have received wires stating that I was going to offer my bill, H. R. 7971, which has the support of these conservation organizations that I have mentioned, as a substitute in toto for the so-called Barkley bill.

For two valid reasons, however, I am not going to offer the substitute, the conservationists' bill, for the Barkley bill at this time. The first reason is this—and I think you will agree with me—that by and large it is not good legislative practice to bring in by amendment a bill 12 pages long dealing with a complicated national problem and ask Members to make a snap judgment for or against that piece of legislation in preference to one the committee has had an opportunity to study. I do not believe that to be a good legislative practice, and I would hate to be in a position where I would have to offer that type of amendment. I am not going to do so.

The second reason why that amendment is not going to be offered is this. I have no desire to attempt to put Members on the spot, either with their constituents or their consciences in endeavoring to make a decision, even if it were good legislative practice, with the time given for this discussion between those two proposals. Consequently our original thought was that perhaps the best thing to do would be to urge those friends of the conservationists' bill, H. R. 7971, to recommit the Barkley bill to the committee for further consideration, because there have been no public hearings on H. R. 7971, which bears the endorsement of the organizations I have previously mentioned and many more. However, conservationists and sportsmen do not like to take a destructive position. We do not like to be in the position, even by indirection, of being opposed to something that aspires to make progress against pollution. Therefore I have offered an amendment to put in some pollution-control language, and I have placed it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where you will find it on the next to the last page of the RECORD of the issue of yesterday.

I have submitted that amendment to the committee in charge of the bill, the Rivers and Harbors Committee. On the assumption that there are enough opponents of any kind of pollution legislation to warrant the view that we should unite in some effort to solve this problem and try to fight from the same corner and play on the same team, I am authorized to tell the committee that I have conferred with the conservation groups, and they are willing to compromise on this basis.

With existing pollution, we perhaps cannot move too hastily, and perhaps with existing pollution we cannot clamp down next year or the year after and say it must immediately cease. Perhaps for a period of a few years we can make some progress by surveying the national problem, by encouraging interstate compacts, by granting low-interest inducements for voluntary remedial measures, and by warning persistent offenders, as we are today, that continued defiance of the public interests will result in more regulations to come.

But, certainly, if we are going to pursue that course, we must at least stop any new forms of pollution and any new sources of contamination from aggravating the present problem while we are trying to solve it. This, in short, is the purpose of the Mundt amendment. With this addition to S. 685 we are ready to accept that legislation since it will then become a step in the right direction and will, for the first time in American history, definitely outlaw new sources of pollution.

We have talked about pollution and criticized it for generations. The Mundt amendment does something about it. It stops the problem from growing worse while we continue to study ways and means of correcting evil practices which are already well on the way to ruining the public waters of this country. Many of us favor applying definite control provisions to existing pollution as well as to future pollution, but we know legislation is a process of compromise and orderly development. For that reason we have offered my amendment as a happy compromise in order that this Congress may write into law for the first time in American history some legislation properly prepared to curb the growth of pollution and providing some encouragement and stimulus to correction of the existing problem.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes.

Mr. HARRINGTON. The statement the gentleman is making is most interesting. Do I understand that the Izaak Walton League and the Audubon Society and other associations have agreed to urge the amendment which the gentleman has proposed and which he has offered to the committee amendment?

Mr. MUNDT. That is right. This is agreed on, that if the committee will accept this amendment so that we can join hands in fighting for some pollution legislation, the league and other organizations working with it in this fight for clean-streams legislation will withdraw their opposition to S. 685 in its then amended form. All the conservationists ask is that no legislation be passed until and unless such legislation actually contains some pollution-controlling features.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. MUNDT. We have agreed that if the committee will accept this amendment, we will withdraw our opposition to S. 685 and go along and make the best progress we can. I am happy to say that we have effected a compromise between both points of view, whereby we can make progress, not as fast as I would like to or as many conservation groups would like, but make it much faster than we would by no legislation at all.

Mr. HARRINGTON. In other words, it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. MUNDT. That is right. We asked for a loaf and were offered a stone, but now we are compromising with a slice of bread.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes.

Mr. PATRICK. I am in this position, and I am sure other Members are in the same class. People apparently all over the country have been corresponding about this, sending communications and resolutions, and the people seem to be under the impression that the gentleman is coming forward today with his amendment. The gentleman now states that he is not. What position will that leave us in, if the gentleman is withholding his bill? I find myself with the gentleman, since we are divided into certain schools of thought.

Now, I am asking the gentleman where that will leave those of us who intended to go along with the amendment, or at least seriously considered doing so. Does that throw us in the position to vote to recommit this bill if we sustain the position we had in mind?

Mr. MUNDT. I do not think so. I do not think you would have to vote to recommit the bill, because we shall have adopted the enforcement feature of my bill, which is the heart of the difference between S. 685 and my bill, insofar as they apply to new sources of pollution.

The opposition to S. 685 is based on that bill in its original form and in the form in which it comes to us as a committee substitute because in both forms it does nothing to control present pollution nor to prevent future pollution. My bill, H. R. 7971, sought to control and prevent both present and future pollution. The amendment I have offered compromises with the committee in charge of the Barkley bill and imposes the control features of H. R. 7971 only on new sources of pollution. While that is not all we wanted, it is a great step in advance, and I am sure the gentleman's constituents who have written him will rejoice in the portion of victory which we have won for clean streams. With this amendment added, I am sure the gentleman and I agree, and that with us all other conservationists will also agree that S. 685 will then be much better than no legislation at all and that it will merit a favorable vote by the big majority of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. SABATH.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed grateful that the gentlemen on the other side recognize the need for this legislation. You are familiar with the fact that a measure or bill to this effect was passed and vetoed by the President, but in this Congress he has made recommendations for this legislation that would eliminate the objections that were found in the bill that we passed.

As I am informed, and on examination of the bill, I am satisfied that those objectionable features have been eliminated, and that this bill meets with general approval. I know that up until some time ago certain organizations were opposed to this legislation, but even many of those organizations now familiar with the amendments, as I understand, are in favor of its passage.

I have been for many years, as have the various city administrations of Chicago for the past 40 years, interested in this question. It has cost the city of Chicago over $180,000,000 to build plants to make possible the elimination of the objectionable matters that have been permitted to infiltrate into our lake. I feel there are many cities which would like to do likewise, but which are not financially in a position to do so.

Mr. Speaker, the bill creates a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service in charge of a commissioned engineer of that Service which, in cooperation with the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, other Federal agencies, and the agencies of the several States, shall study and investigate the pollution of our waterways and streams with a view of submitting comprehensive plans for eliminating or reducing the pollution and improving the sanitary condition of such waterways and streams.

Repeating, the President vetoed a bill previously passed but has since pointed out the need for such legislation as set forth in his message to Congress on February 15, 1939, in which he states in part:

> I hope that at this session the whole problem of water pollution may again receive your attention.
> To facilitate study of the problem by the Congress I am transmitting a report on water pollution in the United States, which outlines the status of pollution, the cost of bringing about a reasonable degree of abatement, and the financial, technical, and administrative aspects of such a program. The document was prepared at my request by a special advisory committee of the National Resources Committee composed of representative experts from the Departments of War, Treasury, the Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from private and State agencies.
> It is my opinion that pending further experimentation with interstate and State enforcement activities Federal participation in pollution abatement should take the general form of establishing a central technical agency to promote and coordinate education, research, and enforcement. On the basis of recent experience, it should be supplemented by a system of Federal grants-in-aid and loans organized with due regard for the integrated use and control of water resources and for a balanced Federal program for public works of all types. The time is overdue for the Federal Government to take vigorous leadership along these lines.

> THE WHITE HOUSE, February 15, 1839.

In accordance with the President's recommendations the Senate passed S. 685, which the resolution for a rule now before us makes in order for immediate consideration. During my absence from the floor the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] has explained the provisions of the bill and, not wishing to take up the further time of the House and wishing to avoid any restatement of his explanations, I shall refrain from going into an analysis of the provisions of the bill. However, I feel the general purpose and need for the enactment of the bill is fully explained in section 5 thereof, and I am taking the liberty of inserting it at this point:

SEC. 5. Any State, municipality, or other public body which is discharging untreated or inadequately treated sewage or wastes into navigable waters of the United States or streams tributary thereto is hereby declared to be eligible to Federal aid in the form of grants-in-aid and/or loans for the construction of necessary treatment works, in accordance with plans approved by the respective State health authority and the Surgeon General. Such loans and grants-in-aid shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the President upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, subject to the following limitations: (1) Grants-in-aid or loans shall be made only upon the certification of the State health authority having jurisdiction and upon approval and recommendation of the Surgeon General; (2) no grant-in-aid shall be made in respect of any project of an amount in excess of 33⅓ percent of the cost of the labor and materials employed upon such project, including the cost of preparation of plans and the carrying of same into execution.

Dr. Thomas Parran, Surgeon General, United States Public Health Service, appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House on March 17, 1937. As our country's foremost expert in public health and sanitation problems, I feel that an excerpt from his statement before the committee as to the existing pollution conditions should be brought to the attention of the House and to the country. I quote:

At the outset I will state very emphatically that the increasing pollution in our streams constitutes a very serious public-health problem. That is evidenced by the increasing growth of industry and the urbanization, adding a larger amount of sewage to our streams.

Mr. Speaker, many municipalities and even States, saying nothing of private industries, have recklessly caused and allowed pollution of our rivers and lakes, endangering the health of whole communities. Chicago, as I have stated, has expended $180,000,000 for the construction of sewage-disposal plants and the building of a sanitary canal. Like Chicago, other cities have gone to great expense to provide for sewage disposal, yet are confronted by a terrible and alarming health condition by having adjacent municipalities and many private industries continue to discharge their sewage into the same lakes or tributary streams on which the municipalities are situated.

Some municipalities and private industries seem to be indifferent to health conditions and are continuing to use our rivers and lakes in disposing of garbage and refuse, and until recently, when stopped by the enactment of city health ordinances, there were firms within the city limits of Chicago who dumped their refuse and offal in the branches and forks of the Chicago River to the ill health of residents of the community and the blighting of property for residential purposes. We have gone forward in Chicago and met the sewage problem. This bill plans to place Nation-wide safeguards against pollution conditions and in order to obtain uniform regulation the Division of Water Pollution Control is authorized to give due consideration and study in conjunction with municipalities and States, and even industries, to bring about a practical solution of the existing conditions. I feel that this legislation is greatly needed and demanded from every section of our country.

I hope that the resolution will be adopted and the bill passed without a great deal of delay.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The Mundt bill, H. R. 7971, was introduced some time back.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, there have been a great many bills introduced on the subject.

Mr. MICHENER. What I am getting at is this: A bill was introduced in the House. The committee introducing the bill asked for a rule reporting that bill. The Rules Committee granted a rule reporting a specific bill. Later the legislative committee came in and asked unanimous consent that a supplementary report might be filed on the original bill. That consent was granted. A supplementary report was filed, which includes the Senate bill, which is an entirely different bill than the Rules Committee authorized a rule for.

Therefore, if you consider the Senate bill in connection with the report, there will be before the House a piece of legislation on which a rule was never granted, about which the Rules Committee knew nothing. The point of the whole thing is this: If that can be done, then, by subterfuge, a committee may bring a perfectly harmless bill before the Rules Committee and get a rule, and then by a later supplemental report absolutely change the bill and still have a place on the legislative program.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman, as a rule, is very careful in his observation and is well informed, but for his information I wish to state that the special rule makes in order Senate bill 685 as amended. Senate bill 685, which is known as the Barkley bill, has been perfected and amended by the House committee and has eliminated some of the objectionable features or features that were objected to originally.

So that today the rule makes in order the Senate bill, as amended, and I believe it is in accordance with the rules of the House, and there is no effort made to mislead the House, and I do not think the committee has been misled.

Mr. MICHENER. The point I am making is that when the Rules Committee reports a bill it is presumed to have some knowledge of the bill and what is in it. They are not reporting a number. If this is permitted, you may introduce a bill by number and it may be entirely harmless, and then by a supplementary report you may bring in another bill, which is entirely different, and still get a place on the calendar, which you could not possibly have gotten from the Rules Committee if the Rules Committee had been told the truth.

Mr. SABATH. I regret that the gentleman from Michigan is mistaken. Here is the bill and here is the special rule. The bill is known as Senate bill 685. A rule was granted on S. 685 and was not granted on any other. I desire to say the rule was granted in the last session, but due to conditions that existed in the last few days of the last session it was not called up, and this is the first time we have had an opportunity to bring this legislation before the House. I do not think there was any misstatement on the part of the committee. It is legislation in the right direction, and I hope that the rule will be passed.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I have used more time than I intended to already.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield briefly.

Mr. KELLER. This resolution refers to S. 685. Then you come in here with a bill that is not S. 685, and I have to look around in the report and finally I find that in the supplemental report the bill partly follows the Senate bill and partly follows something else entirely.

Mr. SABATH. It was amended.

Mr. KELLER. A person cannot get head or tail out of this to save his life. There are two entirely different matters presented, to my judgment.

Mr. SABATH. The bill has been amended by the House committee.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman stated that the Izaak Walton League, and other similar organizations, had recently withdrawn their opposition to S. 685.

Mr. SABATH. I did not say anything about the Izaak Walton League. I spoke about other organizations, such as the American Water Works Association, from which I received a letter only today.

Mr. MOTT. May I inquire whether any of the organizations mentioned by the gentleman from South Dakota in his remarks have withdrawn their opposition to S. 685?

Mr. SABATH. I regret that I was not on the floor when the gentleman from South Dakota made his remarks. I do not know to what associations he referred.

Mr. MOTT. He mentioned the Isaak Walton League. I want to know if this league has changed their position.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back 5 minutes.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know just what the situation is regarding this legislation, and I feel that there are a great many other Members who would like to know what we are to consider, whether it is S. 685 or the bill contained in the supplemental report of the committee.

A great many Members are interested in this piece of legislation. We would like to look it over to see whether we agree with it or disagree with it, but we would like to be informed by somebody—if anybody knows—just which bill is to be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending resolution calls for the consideration of the bill S. 685. When the House goes into the Committee of the Whole, amendments, of course, may be offered to that bill.

Mr. MICHENER. A further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. My further parliamentary inquiry is this, the thing I am concerned about is the integrity of the rules of the House. The function of the Committee on Rules is to understand the type of legislation and the kind of legislation that the legislative committee intends to bring up for consideration.

Mr. SABATH. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Michigan is not in order. The gentleman from Mississippi has the floor and did not yield to him.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman from Michigan for a further parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me to pursue my parliamentary inquiry to get it straightened out?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I may be somewhat dense, but what I am trying to find out is, What is the bill under consideration? Some of us wish to study this bill and find out what it is. We wish to know what the bill is before we vote on the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair will state that the resolution now pending before the House is a resolution from the Committee on Rules, providing, if adopted, for the consideration of Senate bill 685.

Mr. FADDIS. I understand that, Mr. Speaker, and I believe the entire membership present understands what the resolution before us is. What we would like to determine, if it is permissible to have it determined at this time, is just what bill are we going to have to take action on if the rule is granted? We want to know this in advance. Perhaps some of us might feel it advisable to vote down the rule to start with. I think we ought to be informed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be able to clarify the situation in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The resolution now pending provides for the consideration of Senate bill 685. Under the provisions of the rule, if adopted, the Senate bill would be the matter before the House, but under the liberal terms of the rule the Senate bill will be subject to amendment or to amendment by way of substitute from the committee in charge of the bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield for the purpose of a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MICHENER. The Speaker was not in the Chair when I raised my original point. The point was this, that a legislative committee asked for a rule to consider a specific piece of legislation dealing with a specific matter in a particular way. I was not then a member of the committee. After consideration the Rules Committee felt it wise to recommend a rule providing for the consideration of this particular thing in this particular way. Shortly after that the legislative committee secured unanimous consent to file a supplemental report on this original bill, and in their report the legislative committee adopted another bill dealing with the same matter but in an entirely different way and in a way that possibly—and probably—would not have been authorized when the rule was asked for.

A confidential copy is floating around here of the bill which the committee intends to bring up. My inquiry is whether that can be done under the rules of the House. If that can be done, it is a simple matter for any committee to ask for a rule on a perfectly harmless bill which every one might be for, and then, after they get the rule, bring in another bill in fact, under the same number. This rule was granted on July 10 last year. Then in January, 7 months later, they introduce a new bill in a supplemental report and are attempting to bring this new bill dealing with the same subject matter in an entirely different manner before the House under the old rule. Can that be done?

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman submitting a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. My inquiry is, Can that be done?

The SPEAKER. Can what be done?

Mr. MICHENER. I just made an inquiry outlining what I felt was the situation here.

The SPEAKER. In other words, does the gentleman submit the inquiry whether or not the Rules Committee can submit the resolution now pending?

Mr. MICHENER. No. The rule is on a bill which was before the Rules Committee on the 10th of July last year. Will it be in order for the House to take up a different bill included in the supplemental report, and a supplemental report changing the original bill entirely?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it understands the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MICHENER. The Rules Committee never saw this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], who raises this question by parliamentary inquiry, of course, is familiar with the general principle that all proposed action touching the rules, joint rules, and orders of business shall be referred to the Committee on Rules. Under a broad, uniform construction of that jurisdiction, the Rules Committee, as the Chair understands it, has practically plenary power, unreserved and unrestricted power, to submit for the consideration of the House any order of business it sees fit to submit, subject, of course, to the approval of the House.

The Chair, of course, knows nothing about what was in the minds of the committee in reference to this legislation. The Chair can only look at the face of the record as it is presented from a parliamentary standpoint. As the Chair construes the resolution now pending, it is very broad in its terms. It provides for the consideration of a Senate bill pending on the Union Calendar and the Chair assumes that the Committee on Rules was requested to give a rule for the consideration of that bill, which was the original basis for any legislation that may be passed touching this subject of stream pollution.

In conformance with the general power and jurisdiction of the Rules Committee, it did report a resolution providing that in the consideration of the Senate bill any germane amendments may be offered; and, of course, it is not the province of the Chair, presiding over the House, to determine the relevancy or germaneness of any amendment that may be submitted in the Committee of the Whole, whether by way of a substitute or by way of amendment.

The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the Rules Committee had a perfect right under the general authority conferred upon it to report this resolution providing for this method of consideration of the bill.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, we have had quite a discussion with reference to the parliamentary situation that exists, and I think the Speaker has explained it very well. Anything I may say in addition certainly could not add very much. I have seen many times in my experience here on the floor, brief as it has been, occasions when legislative committees, after their bill has been given a rule by the Rules Committee, later agree on amendments that are to be offered on the floor, and, as I understand it, that is all that is contemplated in the present situation. Certain amendments that have been agreed to by the committee are to be offered.

Briefly, those amendments are three. The first one is to take out of the bill as originally reported on May 10 of last year a provision for grants-in-aid to the States. The second change is to take out of the bill as reported the provision which would have paid $700,000 each year to the different States to carry out the antipollution measures. The third one is to change the lending provisions from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Since that time, and as a result of some communications back and forth and some effort to try to write a good bill, an amendment has been prepared and will be offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], and this amendment will not be opposed by the committee. Obviously, under the rule, he has a perfect right to offer this amendment. He may offer a great many more, but, as I understand the situation, he will not do so.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. There has been no agreement so far as I know that there will be no opposition from the committee to the Mundt amendment. I am a member of the committee, and I am opposed to the Mundt amendment.

Mr. HALLECK. Perhaps I said too much when I undertook to state what might be done by the committee.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. It is my understanding that the gentleman is against any kind of an antipollution bill, and naturally he would oppose the Mundt amendment.

Mr. HALLECK. I think I am correct in saying that the majority of the committee who have been diligently for S. 635 as reported by the committee and as it is presented here today are not inclined to oppose the amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does not the gentleman feel that in view of the fact this bill was reported nearly a year ago and only recently the amendments have been agreed to by the committee or submitted by the committee, in the interest of orderly procedure the House today should adopt the rule and that those in charge of the bill should print in the RECORD tonight the amendments that they are going to offer so that under general debate there might be intelligent discussion of the bill as the proposed amendments of the committee would change it? I am opposed to the bill, but I would like to know what you are going to offer so I can make an argument against the bill that the committee would like to have enacted.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. I think the gentleman misunderstands the amendment. The Mundt amendment is not the amendment included in the supplemental report.

Mr. HALLECK. I recognize that. Now, I believe I can clear this up, at least to the satisfaction of anyone who wants to approach it with a consideration of the situation as it now exists. The report was gotten out by the committee on February 20. I have been sitting here for quite a few years, and I notice we have not been given that long a time in connection with a great many measures.

Mr. COCHRAN. This report states it is as of May 10, 1939.

Mr. HALLECK. I am talking about the supplemental report made by the committee. That supplemental report sets out the bill as it will be urged here by the committee, and that necessarily includes the amendments. Obviously, the amendment that is to be offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] has not been printed, but I do not know of any rule of the House that requires a Member who wants to offer an amendment to have it printed anywhere before he offers it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Under the rules of the House, the Mundt amendment would be controlled by the rule of germaneness. Any Member can introduce an amendment, and the House will take care of itself on the subject of germaneness.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, if the amendment were not germane, under the rule it would not withstand a point of order made against it; but if it is germane, there is no reason why it should not be offered at any time by any Member who wants to offer it.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. May I say that if anyone wants to read the amendment, it is printed on page 3273 of the RECORD.

Mr. HALLECK. If the gentleman will permit, however, he has made some slight change in it?

Mr. MUNDT. Some slight modifications in conformity with the committee's request.

Mr. HALLECK. But in essence it has been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MUNDT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to my genial chairman.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the Committee on Rules has been criticized at times for bringing in gag rules and not permitting amendments; but now, when they bring in a broad rule giving every Member a chance to offer amendments, I find some gentlemen opposed to this broad rule giving each and every Member the right to offer amendments and giving the House the right to vote on them?

Mr. HALLECK. This is undoubtedly an open rule. It is the sort of rule that all of us who believe legislation should be written on the floor stand for in connection with matters like this.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. It seems that everybody who is given time to speak here is for the bill, but all of us who have objection to it have absolutely no time to point out the difficulties that are included in this rule. It seems to me that is unfair and it is not right.

Mr. HALLECK. I yielded for a question, as the gentleman from Illinois knows.

Mr. KELLER. Is not that true?

Mr. HALLECK. There is time on the gentleman's side and there is time on our side. I do not know who is for or against the bill. I know how I feel about it.

If you will permit me, I would like now to say what little I have to say about the bill. In the first place, this bill in its broader aspects simply provides for the setting up in the United States Public Health Service of a division to study the problem of stream pollution, water pollution, and to undertake to devise ways and means of preventing such pollution and overcoming and eliminating it. The bill provides an appropriation annually for that purpose. It provides for cooperation with the States in carrying on that program.

As the bill is presently reported from the Committee, there is no so-called control feature in it. There is nothing in the bill that could be said to look in the direction of affirmative and direct action toward either eliminating pollution that now exists or preventing pollution that may occur hereafter. The Mundt amendment has to do only with pollution of waterways that will hereafter occur.

As I understand it, the Mundt amendment states that no sewage or industrial waste shall be permitted to be discharged into the navigable waters of the United States or waters tributary thereto unless and until approved by the division which is to be set up in the United States Public Health Service under the general provisions of this bill. In other words, the Mundt amendment, for the first time, in my opinion, writes something into this bill that looks definitely in the direction of doing something directly about controlling pollution of our water courses.

I believe that anyone who has been around over this country and knows anything of the situation in respect to pollution of streams must agree that it is high time some cognizance, active and aggressive, be taken of the situation and something done to cure it. Pollution occurs by reason of industrial waste and by reason of municipal waste. Sewage and industrial waste flow into the streams that go across State boundaries or streams that form the boundaries of States. It is a matter of concern to all of us and I believe it is high time we paid some attention to it.

Clear, pure water, or at least something approximating clear and pure water, in the streams of this country, is highly desirable. Watercourses and the water in them are put to manifold uses in our civilization. A watercourse tends to set up a community of itself. It is proper that the water be used in the many ways that it is used. The water in the streams, first of all, provides the water supply for many of our great municipalities. Let me say to you that the hearings disclose that one-fourth of the water in the pool in the Ohio River at Cincinnati, 20 miles long, in low-water time has come out of sewers.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Cincinnati dumps its raw sewage into the Ohio River in the very pool from which it takes its water for its drinking supply.

In many places the pollution loads often became so great that it is almost impossible to purify the water before it may be used. The trouble with too many of these situations is that we are putting the money in at the wrong end. It is time we began to spend some money for sewage-disposal plants, some money to eliminate industrial waste running into our streams instead of spending so much money to purify the water after it has been polluted.

The water in these streams should be available to the people of America for recreational facilities. It should continue to be the habitat of the fish and the shellfish of the country. You talk to some of these people down in Virginia along the James River, and in some of those places there are oyster beds, valuable properties which are being destroyed by pollution. These people are crying for relief.

Water is used as a medium of transportation, and that is a very valuable use. And, of course, we must all recognize that the waterways and our watercourses and streams must necessarily be used in carrying away and disposing of the waste and refuse from our great municipalities and industrial centers. All of these uses of our waterways should be harmonized so far as possible, to the end that the greatest use in behalf of the people generally should be retained for them. I think that is what we are all seeking to do.

Now, when we talk about the pollution of streams incident to their use in disposing of sewage and waste, I understand that great and tremendous expense would be involved in trying to do away with pollution overnight, but we should be making a start in that direction. Certainly there should be some limit to the extent to which either muncipalities or industries can go in further polluting the streams of the country. This is what, in my opinion, the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from South Dakota will, in some measure, undertake to do. It is all right to study the problem; it is all right for these Federal agencies to devise ways and means of seeking to cure the pollution of the streams, but I think the amendment that is to be offered should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield for that purpose?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. I ask that we be given 30 minutes for those who are opposed to the adoption of the rule to discuss this matter, since the hour has been used by those in favor of it, and it seems only fair that there should be 30 minutes for those opposed to the rule.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter that is within the control of the gentleman in charge of the resolution, if he yields for that purpose.

Mr. KELLER. That is the way they have used the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must observe the rules of the House with reference to the matter brought up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER]. The Chair is not undertaking to decide this at all, but under the general rules of procedure the gentleman from Mississippi is in charge of the rule, and if he yields to the gentleman from Illinois to make that request, the Chair, of course, will be glad to entertain it.

Mr. KELLER. Do I not understand it is the ordinary rule that half of the time be given to each side?

The SPEAKER. As an ordinary proposition, that is true, but there may be exceptions, of course. The Chair thinks it proper to state to the gentleman from Illinois that the ordinary procedure, when a resolution is brought in from the Rules Committee, is for the majority member of the Rules Committee to have 30 minutes and to yield 30 minutes to some member of the minority. The Chair understands that practice is being followed in this instance.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the bill before the House. As a sportsman and fisherman and out-of-doors man I have been trying to do everything I could to bring about a restoration of the purity of the streams, the lakes, and the rivers of this country.

About 4 years ago I had a long discussion with the President, and it was as a result of our understanding that I introduced a resolution here which was the basis of a Nation-wide investigation on the part of the Army engineers of the War Department, which was later referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I think that report constituted the basis of this legislation.

I should like to see a stronger, restrictive, and a more specific bill brought into the House today, but since that cannot be had at this time, I am, of course, willing to compromise, because I consider this bill to be a step in the right direction.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I am sorry, but I have just a few minutes.

Mr. SOUTH. For just a brief question, which I am sure the gentleman will be willing to answer.

Mr. DINGELL. For just one brief question, yes.

Mr. SOUTH. The gentleman knows that my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Mr. MANSFIELD, is in the hospital. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows whether this bill, including the Mundt amendment, is somewhat in keeping with the recommendations of Mr. MANSFIELD'S committee and what he himself is in favor of.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I cannot answer the question. I am not familiar with the wishes of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD]. For perhaps 60 or 70 years, during the period of our industrial development in this country, industry has assumed as a matter of right not only to take the pure water of our streams and lakes but to pollute and destroy the wholesomeness of these bodies by dumping industrial refuse into these lakes and streams and rivers. The city and State institutions have dumped raw sewage into these rivers and lakes and have caused irreparable harm. Game birds, migratory and shore birds, and wildlife generally were being destroyed by the thousands, and where once a stream is polluted, wildlife and game never come back to it. I want these streams to be enjoyed by all the people. I want the manufacturers and the municipalities to have the full use of these natural resources, but I insist that these are God-given resources, to be enjoyed by all, and within restrictive limitations by certain special interests; I want these lakes and rivers and streams to be enjoyed by sportsmen and out-of-doors people today, and I want them to be enjoyed in later years after I have gone on by my children and my children's children; but unless there is a limitation, a very specific, a very definite circumscription in the law to prevent these vicious abuses, the beauty and the utility of our waters will be destroyed forever. Industries will not conform to the latest and newest idea about the elimination of stream pollution unless compelled to do so. Certainly there will always be enough of them who will not, to defeat our objective. I am sorry that I must assume an attitude so uncompromising and forceful, but I think I am obliged to place the blame as I see it and as I know it to be.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Would the gentleman be willing to accept this rather than nothing at all, to give us a start?

Mr. DINGELL. To make my position clear, I think I mentioned earlier that I thought this is a step in the right direction, although the bill does not go as far as I would like to have it go, but I have made it clear that I would accept this bill as a beginning. I would like to see the bill amended in such a way that there would be a certain progressive time schedule for conforming to a carefully worked-out plan. Public sentiment will sustain severe penalties to force compliance. Some industries and municipalities voluntarily corrected their abuses. The Public Works Administration has been very helpful in eliminating municipal sewage pollution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that there is not a quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to; and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 3069. An act to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes.

WATER-POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 685) to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 685, with Mr. O'NEAL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman expect to read the bill for amendment tonight?

Mr. GAVAGAN. If possible, I would like to finish the bill tonight; but whatever the committee wishes to do will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. CARTER. If we could have an agreement that the completion of the bill may go over until tomorrow, I may not object. Otherwise I shall object to the gentleman's request.

Mr. GAVAGAN. I have no objection to the bill's going over until tomorrow.

Mr. CARTER. With that understanding I will withdraw my objection.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be any bill introduced in this Congress that is of so vital importance to the people I represent as some effective stream pollution elimination measure.

I want to tell you something of the history of this bill. You remember session before last the Barkley-Vinson bill was passed by both the House and the Senate. It was vetoed by the President, because he said it did not conform to the ordinary budgetary requirements. Subsequently that same bill, with the budgetary requirements inserted, was introduced both in the Senate by Senator BARKLEY and in the House by me. We did not seem to make any progress in the consideration of that bill. There was a conference held with the health authorities of the Government, with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and Senator BARKLEY and me with the President in regard to some effective stream pollution elimination measure.

This proposed amendment grew out of that conference. I can say to you that it meets with the approval of the health authorities of the United States; that it meets with the approval of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and that it meets with the approval of the President of the United States.

The bill as originally introduced and passed provided for loans both to industries and to municipalities and grants to municipalities. The amendment that is proposed here merely provides for loans to municipalities and to subdivisions of the State. I think probably I am more interested in the elimination of pollution and represent more people who are more vitally interested in that subject than any other people in the United States. My district is just across the Ohio River from the city of Cincinnati. You have been told that the Ohio River has been locked and improved for purposes of navigation. I do not suppose there is any river on the continent that is more highly improved for that purpose than the Ohio River. There is a pool in that river that extends from Fernbank to Coney Island, a distance of probably 15 miles, that in the summer is a stinking pool, into which goes the industrial waste and domestic sewage of 800,000 people. Out of that pool comes the water supply of the city of Cincinnati, of the city of Covington, of the city of Newport, the city of Bellevue, the city of Dayton, and the city of Fort Thomas. All of those cities mentioned, except Cincinnati, are on the other side of the river in my district. I know I speak their earnest wish when I ask you today to pass some measure that may at least start on the elimination of the pollution of that river.

I do not believe you can approach this matter by harsh measures. I do not believe you can compel cities to clean up the rivers by processes of abatement and injunction. Already under the common law we can abate a nuisance. An individual can abate a private nuisance. An individual can abate a public nuisance if his interests are affected thereby. Here we have the proposition under a proposed amendment that this matter shall be in the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. They may invade the province of the State, and they can exercise their jurisdiction on tha cities along the navigable streams of the United States in order to compel them to abate this nuisance that grows out of the sewage of the cities being dumped into the inland streams. I ask you how you are going to exercise this power. I want to know if there is any judge in the United States who will grant an injunction to abate this character of nuisance when the offender is the city, and the greatest offenders are the cities of this country. What judge will enter an order enjoining the continued use of the city sewers?

Into those city sewers go not only the domestic sewage of the people who live there but also the greatest quantity of industrial waste from the great manufacturing enterprises. Almost all the great industries of our country are situated in our cities and they have no other manner in which to dispose of their waste but to dump it into the city sewers.

The only way some contend we can combat these nuisances is by enjoining the operation of the sewers in the cities of the United States. In doing this you might protect the fish and aquatic life, the migratory wild fowl, but you kill all the citizens in the great valley. Certainly that remedy is not desirable.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. For a question.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is making an interesting discussion, but I wonder what benefit this improvement would be to the cities in Ohio and Kentucky in the case of a flood such as we had in 1937 which came down the Ohio River and submerged the entire valley, pouring not only the filth of cities but of many States down that valley? I ask the gentleman if he does not believe it might be better to do something toward preventing these floods rather than to pass a bill of this nature?

Mr. SPENCE. No; I do not, because if this pollution continues at the rate it has been going on and nothing is done to relieve it, there will not be any people in the Ohio Valley to be flooded. To preserve the health of the people of the Ohio Valley it seems to me it is essential that we look forward to correcting these conditions at some not far distant time. The flood of 1937 was an act of God. The pollution of the streams is not an act of God but of man and is something that can be remedied.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Then, are we not getting the cart before the horse? Had we not better spend some money to prevent these awful floods, particularly the ones in the Ohio Valley which cost this country half a billion dollars and on top of that we had to go in and spend Government money to clean it up?

Mr. SPENCE. Man has never conceived any method that would prevent a flood such as occurred in the Ohio River in 1937. That was an act of God, and man, in the presence of such a thing as that, is impotent. Rain came in a little section of the Ohio Valley and made a sea out of that river. We cannot do anything to prevent a recurrence of that kind. But here is a condition that we can mitigate now. How ought we to meet this problem?

The municipalities are not in many instances able to pay for the proper interceptor sewers and disposal plants to do away with the future pollution of the rivers. They have not the money to do it. This bill makes no provision for any grant to any State or any subdivision. It merely gives the municipalities and the industries the opportunity to borrow under long terms at reasonable rates of interest funds that they can use in building intercepting sewers and disposal plants.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. I think that the cities and those who are responsible for the operation of the municipal functions in the Ohio Valley are anxious to eliminate this condition. I believe if the cities are given the opportunity to secure the necessary funds they will use them in a manner that will result eventually in the elimination of the pollution of the river, and I believe it is the only effective way by which this can be accomplished. Now, if you attempt to put this power into the United States courts to enjoin the cities from continuing this, to abate the nuisances, it is not certain that they would have jurisdiction except upon navigable streams. It is not the navigable streams, however, that have entirely caused the condition that exists. In Cincinnati there is Mill Creek, a terribly polluted little stream, not navigable. The Congress could not delegate to a Federal court jurisdiction over such a stream, for the only jurisdiction the United States has over navigable streams is under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

It is said that we ought to delay passage of this bill because we have not given it sufficient consideration. Since 1921 many hearings have been held upon this subject. The Rivers and Harbors Committee had extensive hearings in 1924. At least 15 hearings have been printed. Sixty-five bills have been introduced for this purpose. It seems to me after the long investigation of this subject that the Congress is certainly in position to take some definite action. The committee, I believe, has accepted one of the amendments offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], possibly a modified amendment of the one that appeared in the RECORD. I am not in favor of the acceptance of any amendment. I believe we should exercise our influence and our persuasion upon the municipalities that are polluting the streams. I believe if we can get that part of the pollution cleaned up that the greatest pollution of the streams will be eliminated. After we have given the municipalities the opportunity to do what they can to eliminate pollution, if there still remain recalcitrant industries, or manufacturing establishments along the rivers, who are unwilling to conform to our expressed purpose and the requirements of the law, I am in favor of passing some drastic law, but I believe if we pass a harsh measure now it will not have the effect we want it to have, it will not encourage these municipalities to do the things we want them to do, and I am confident that the passage of the proposed amendment to Senate 685 is the only remedy we should apply at the present time.

In addition to the provision in the bill for loans there is a provision for compacts between the States. Many of the States have already made these compacts by which we will have coordinated, effective, and uniform action by the States, which is very essential if we are going to have any real elimination of stream pollution.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to read an editorial on this subject appearing in the Cincinnati Enquirer on last Saturday, February 24, which, I am confident, speaks the wishes of the majority of the people in the Ohio Valley. The editorial speaks of the bill as introduced in the House as my bill. However, I claim no credit and have no pride of authorship as it was merely the Barkley-Vinson bill we introduced with the budgetary requirements inserted:

SPORT—OR PUBLIC HEALTH?

Now, that the stream purification legislation has been reported out of committee in a form which substitutes loans to communities and industry from the Reconstruction Finance Administration rather than by grants-in-aid from the Treasury or other drains upon it, there was reason to hope for early passage.

The amendments to the Barkley-Spence bill as it passed the Senate surely remove any legitimate hesitation Congress or the President might advance toward any further drains on the national economy. But once more in the history of this legislation some of the very forces which have been protesting their allegiance to the cause of pollution abatement show up as obstructionists. These are the spokesmen for the Izaak Walton League.

Their purpose is to make the waters safe for fish by mandatory and punitive action by the Federal Government. There are several reasons why such an approach may be disastrous to the whole cause. Surely the most cogent is the improbability that any such measures could pass Congress. The second is that if passed, the doubtful constitutionality would first have to run the gantlet of the courts, further delaying the process by which the only real purification progress has been achieved.

The avowed impulse back of the Barkley-Spence bill is the preservation of the public health by the removal of such pollution as amounts to a peril in the Ohio and other streams. This is not enough for the Izaak Walton League officials, who assert that another standard, sufficient for aquatic life—which most city-treated water is not—must obtain.

The Izaak Walton League does not speak for all sportsmen. In a recent drive for membership it complained that not more than 5 percent of sportsmen belonged to such organizations. Nor is there evidence that the spokesmen represent the views of the whole of the membership.

Even if they do they are imperiling a measure which has the full support of every State board of health and the health authorities of the United States Government. Do they care to be on record as opposing public health?

In doing so they are lining up with such lobbyists as have been retained by the principal polluters in the United States.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, the matter before the House this afternoon is one of the greatest importance to the American public. It deals with the preserving of our public health, fish, and wildlife.

Pollution of our waterways which first became alarming some 20 years ago has been steadily increasing until it has become a national menace. Sewage and industrial waste dumped into many of our rivers from which domestic water supplies are taken has become so great as to reach the point where epidemics of large proportions are imminent.

It is amazing that this condition has been allowed to grow to such an extent without some controlling legislation by the Federal Government long ago.

Since 1921 the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has had before it for consideration some 65 bills relating to the control of water pollution. Extensive hearings have been held on the majority of these bills, but the only legislation so far enacted into law is the Oil Pollution Act of 1924. This act served only to prevent the discharge of oil into the coastal waters of the United States.

Now we have before us the bill, S. 685, which, after all these years, presents a means of controlling pollution in the navigable waterways and their tributaries of the United States. The public-health authorities of the United States have been almost unanimous in their approval of the provisions of this bill. It is doubtful if any bill ever before this Congress has had such long and intensive study and consideration.

The bill is a simple one. It establishes a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service.

This Division will be manned by sanitary engineers whose sole duties will be to design means of reducing or eliminating the pollution in our national waterways.

Surveys to determine the source and type of pollution in a locality will be made by these engineers on the request of any State health authority, subject to the approval of the Surgeon General, and review reports may be ordered by resolution of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House or the Senate Committee on Commerce, who act upon the recommendation of a Member of Congress. Plans are to be drawn up and recommendations made as to the best possible means to control the type of pollution involved, whether sewage or industrial waste, and submitted to the State or municipal health department requesting same by the Surgeon General.

A board of five members is created within this Division, four to be commissioned officers of the Public Health Service, and the fifth, the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, or a member of the Corps of Engineers designated by him; all to serve without additional compensation. The duties of this board shall be to pass on all reports of investigations and plans for corrective methods and submit to the Surgeon General recommendations as to their desirability and feasibility.

With a practical plan in hand recommended by the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, the locality affected will then be eligible for a construction loan through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at a reasonable interest, possibly as low or lower than 2¾ percent.

The whole cost to the United States for administering this bill is $250,000 annually.

This is a cooperative venture and the record shows that the States are ready and willing to cooperate. They have been waiting for this incentive and as the able and lovable chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, J. J. MANSFIELD, pointed out in his extension of remarks printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I understand was dictated from his hospital bed, more progress has been made in the last 6 years through P. W. A. loans and grants than in all the time previous in the matter of the construction of sewage-treatment works. Of course, the P. W. A. program is now a matter of the past, and if this bill becomes a law the good work done toward this end in the last 6 years will be more than duplicated in the next 6 years under the encouragement of loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The pollution of some of our streams is nearing the saturation point, and the enactment of this bill into law is urgent. The insignificant amount necessary to carry out the purposes of this bill will pay dividends a thousandfold in good health to the American public.

Resolution regarding the proposed Water Pollution Act (S. 685), pending before the Seventy-sixth Congress, third session

Be it resolved, That the members of the Great Lakes Boards of Health Commissioners and Engineers—of New York, Pennsylvania,[1] Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin—and the Upper Mississippi River Boards of Health Commissioners and Engineers—of Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Illinois, and Wisconsin—convening in joint session at Chicago, this 3d of February 1940, hereby approve the Federal-State cooperative type of water-pollution control embodied in the Barkley bill, S. 685, now pending in Congress in its present form, or as it may be amended to provide for long-term loans at low rates of interest in lieu of a combination of grants-in-aid and loans; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to all State and Territorial health officers, Members, and appropriate committees of Congress, and others concerned.

FEDERAL-STATE PATTERN OF STREAM POLLUTION ACTIVITY IS GETTING RESULTS—IT NEEDS EXPANSION—A STATEMENT FAVORING ENACTMENT OF BARKLEY BILL, S. 685

From 1935 to 1940 proposed stream-pollution legislation of a national character has been evolving in the Congress through active intensive efforts to key legislators, public-health officials, fishermen and sportsmen, industrial managements, and broad-minded civic leaders who recognize that stream pollution is a national incubus which is harming public health, handicapping industry, and destroying recreational assets of our Nation. President Roosevelt in his message to Congress urging action in February 1939, said "The time is overdue for the Federal Government to take vigorous leadership along these lines."

The type of legislation which is unanimously supported by all sections of the country and by people in all walks of life, with one exception—certain sportsmen who want the job done immediately through drastic court action—is a natural outgrowth and expansion of the successful program which has been carried forward for the past 10 or 15 years through the cooperative efforts of State and Federal agencies concerned with stream pollution. The proposed legislation provides for the United States Public Health Service handling the work administratively, setting up standards of water quality for the drainage systems of the United States. It also provides for long-term loans at low interest rates to cities and to industries, but utilizes the existing police power of the States to carry out necessary control measures. State compacts are to be organized to deal effectively with sections of the country where interstate stream pollution is a problem.

HISTORY OF PAST 6 YEARS SHOWS OUTSTANDING PROGRESS

The history of what has been accomplished in the past is the best criterion of what will be done in the future under any specified plan of procedure. With that in mind let us briefly examine what State health departments and State water-pollution control agencies have done in the period of 1933 and 1938, working in cooperation with the United States Public Health Service, Works Progress Administration, and Public Works Administration.

In 1904 the sewage from approximately 1,000,000 people, 3 percent of the urban population of the country, was treated. In 1932 more than 30 percent received treatment, and by 1938 nearly 60 percent of the sewage was receiving either primary or secondary treatment. The almost miraculous rate of progress in the last 6 years has been due to State health department activity, popular education, and Federal financial assistance.

The States have been successful in getting their cities to build sewage-treatment plants to reduce stream pollution. In the Ohio River basin much stimulus has come from well-directed civic activity in Cincinnati, whose citizens fear the destruction of their drinking-water supply owing to the rapid increase in pollution of the Ohio River, which is the source of their public water supply. During the last 6 years the progress made by 7 States in this large industrial section of the country in reducing stream pollution was as follows: Ohio, 114; Pennsylvania, 73; Kentucky, 61; West Virginia, 21; Tennessee, 24; Indiana, 48; Illinois, 87.

Summarizing this situation we see that 428 cities in 7 States in the Ohio Basin spent nearly $100,000,000 in the last 6 years to reduce detrimental pollution coming from sewage and industrial wastes.

MANY INDUSTRIES ARE ACTIVELY AT WORK REDUCING POLLUTION

Industrial wastes coming from manufacturing plants within a city are generally discharged into the city sewerage system. Thus, these wastes flow directly to the sewage-treatment plant and are treated before discharge to the stream. In Ohio it is significant of the trend of the times to find that three large milk-plant managements have just completed treatment plants which are operating successfully. These industries were located on small streams outside the city sewerage system. Over a period of years the cooperative effort of the United States Public Health Service and the State health departments of Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, and Kentucky have brought about the installation of 21 phenol waste-treatment plants at byproduct coke ovens, built at a cost of millions of dollars by the industrial managements. Several basic industries, notably pulp and paper, tanning, and the iron and steel group, have active research programs under way with capable staffs. They are working to find out ways and means to reduce industrial wastes which are causing detrimental pollution.

The United States Public Health Service took the leadership in 1933 in organizing a program to combat acid mine-drainage pollution coming from over 25,454 coal mines in 8 States in the Ohio Basin. Daily from these abandoned and active coal mines over 15,000,000 pounds of mine acid closely resembling full strength sulfuric acid flows into the tributaries of the Ohio. The sealing of abandoned coal mines was started in 1933, and this program, carried on by the Works Progress Administration and supervised by the Public Health Service, is reducing the tremendous acid load in Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Maryland. In some basins in West Virginia already a 60-percent reduction in acid load has been noted. Unemployed coal miners on relief have built many thousands of traps and water seals and closed many holes into the mines to effectively air seal them, thereby turning destructive acid water into useful sweet water again.

We favor enactment of the Barkley stream-pollution bill (S. 685), and accept amendments proposed by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, since these amendments seem necessary to obtain approval of the measure.

COMMITTEE ON STREAM POLLUTION OF THE CINCINNATI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
HUDSON BIERY, Chairman.

Communication No. 47, February 24, 1940.

Mr. Chairman, who is for this bill? I have before me a letter from the Michigan Department of Health and a resolution which was unanimously passed by the health commissioners of the several States indicated therein on the 3d day of February this year in the city of Chicago. The Great Lakes Board of Public Health Commission and the Upper Mississippi Board of Public Health Commission met in the city of Chicago representing the following States: New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin and the Upper Mississippi Boards of Health Commissioners and Engineers for Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Illinois, and Wisconsin, and unanimously passed a resolution approving the Federal-State cooperative type of water-pollution control, such as recommended by this bill reported by the Rivers and Harbors Committee unanimously, with the exception of one or two members who reserved the right to oppose it on the floor of the House.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Has the gentleman a copy of the resolution referred to?

Mr. DONDERO. Yes, I have a copy of the resolution referred to, and I shall insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman tells us of the numerous people who are in favor of this particular bill. The gentleman will agree with me that the Izaak Walton League, the Audubon Society, and many outdoor sportsmen have opposed the Barkley bill. We have before us a compromise bill which the committee has written, and many objectionable features of the Barkley bill have been entirely eliminated. The committee has taken up and considered the principles favored by the Izaak Walton League, the Audubon Society, and others, therefore we have a new bill here which they approve?

Mr. DONDERO. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. And with the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] we are all agreed that it will contain principles satisfactory to the Izaak Walton League and other similar organizations?

Mr. DONDERO. Yes. The Mundt amendment seeks to prevent future or new pollution of our navigable waters and their tributaries.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. What provisions are there in this bill, relative to pollution, which endangers the public health that the State departments of public health have not already got?

Mr. DONDERO. Let me answer the gentleman this way: The pending bill leaves to the police power of the States the question of control of the pollution of their waters.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Which power they already have.

Mr. DONDERO. The Federal cooperative agencies of this Government, acting in conjunction with the States, will help solve the problem.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Do they need any help from the Federal Government when they have the power now to enforce the law?

Mr. DONDERO. I think they do in those States where the navigable waters are boundary streams and where the streams run through more than one State. This bill provides for the making of compacts between States.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. If it was not for that particular provision there would be no necessity for this bill at all, would there?

Mr. DONDERO. That is true; but I want to call to the attention of the House the progress that has been made. In 1904 approximately 1,000,000, or 3 percent of the urban population of the country, had their sewage treated. In 1932, 30 percent, and in 1938, 60 percent. I call attention to that fact to show the progress we are making in this country without using the "big stick." Dr. Parran, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, informed me that they have had practically 100-percent cooperation from municipalities, industry, and everyone concerned in trying to solve this very difficult problem; and only where the municipalities or industries did not have the finances to correct the situation did the Department not have their cooperation. In the Ohio River Valley, in the last 6 years, where perhaps the problem of stream pollution is the greatest of any place in the United States, 428 cities have corrected the condition and have done it without the use of force, drastic or harsh legislation.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. I should like to renew the question which I asked the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

The gentleman is a member of the great committee presided over by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD]. May I ask the gentleman whether or not the gentleman from Texas is in sympathy with this bill?

Mr. DONDERO. He is entirely and wholeheartedly in favor of this bill. This bill comes from his committee and he was present at all the hearings and when it was reported to this House.

Mr. SOUTH. I know he is tremendously interested in this bill, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. DONDERO. He is, and I know that it is his opinion that this is a sensible and a moderate approach to the problem.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. I did not understand the gentleman's statement about the section in which such excellent progress had been made. Will the gentleman repeat that statement?

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman will find that information in the hearings on this bill. I have before me a statement coming from the Stream Pollution Committee of Cincinnati and the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati in which the same figures are used, and I will give the number of cities by States in the Ohio River Valley that have solved their problem.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DONDERO. Here they are: Ohio, 114; Pennsylvania, 73; Kentucky, 61; West Virginia, 21; Tennessee, 24; Indiana, 48; and Illinois, 87. It is a remarkable and commendable record, showing what we have done by cooperation and without force. [Applause.]

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of the bill before the House for consideration are not new to Congress. They are the result of years of study by public and private agencies for the purpose of charting a course that will solve one of the most serious problems facing this country today. It cannot be contended that this problem affects only those areas adjacent to navigable streams or their tributaries, for national health is something that is Nation-wide. This proposed legislation cannot, in any sense of the word, be classed as experimental, nor is it designed to bring about merely temporary benefits. In its present form no grants-in-aid to local subdivisions are provided for. Financial help is made possible only through R. F. C. loans.

The menace of stream pollution is something that cannot be dealt with without Federal cooperation and aid. The contamination of our navigable streams and their tributaries has reached the stage where local treatment plants are, or soon will be, inadequate to deal with the problem. Let me refer for a moment to conditions as they exist today in the Ohio Valley the drainage basin of which includes 200,000 square miles comprising parts of 14 States. The population of the basin is 17,000,000 people. Raw, untreated sewage from localities containing almost 6,000,000 perons is discharged daily into the Ohio River and its tributaries, and, in addition thereto, treated sewage from areas containing 2,500,000 additional persons is discharged into the Ohio River and its tributaries every day. Six million two hundred thousand persons are supplied with water from the Ohio and its tributaries. The bacterial pollution of the river at certain periods of the year is much greater than is considered safe to be used as a water supply, even when the water is treated by the most up-to-date methods of filtration and chemical processes. All of the larger cities on the Ohio River place their raw, untreated sewage in the river. The time was when the river flowed freely and thus created, to a limited extent, a natural process of purification, but the Ohio River is now a series of navigation dams consisting of more than 50 in number. During low water these dams retard the flow and create a series of pools. Near the larger cities they are open cesspools, and from such places these cities derive their water supply.

For a number of years there has been an alarming increase in the pollution of Ohio River water. The Public Health Service has found that water containing as much as 5,000 bacillus coli per 100 cubic centimeters may be chemically treated and used for drinking water. Prior to 1935 raw water in the Cincinnati area averaged annually about 2,600 bacillus coli per 100 cubic centimeters. Since that time the average has increased at an alarming rate. For the year 1935 the average was 10,330. In August 1938 the highest monthly average on record, it reached 28,840. During the entire year 1938 the average was 10,580 more than twice the average considered by the Public Health Service as safe for drinking purposes. Cincinnati has just spent $3,000,000 to improve its processes for water treatment, and the city has been supplied with safe drinking water through chemical treatment, but health authorities are reluctant to prophesy how much longer the water can be safely treated regardless of the amount spent for treatment plants, thus indicating the necessity for the handling of the stream-pollution menace by the Federal Government in conjunction with the States and their political subdivisions, as well as with private industry. It can readily be appreciated that the taking of steps to eliminate stream pollution in any given area would be useless unless similar action were taken over the entire course of the river for, with every rise in the river, the localities downstream must take the pollution from upstream. It would be of no advantage to Cincinnati, for example, to spend millions of dollars largely to benefit Louisville and other downstream cities unless there was some assurance that Pittsburgh and other upstream cities did likewise.

Engineers have estimated that when the Ohio River is at a low stage in the Cincinnati area we have a flow of about 6,000 cubic feet per second, 1,500 cubic feet of which have been through sewers. In other words, one-fourth of the entire flow, or 1 quart out of every gallon of water, has passed through sewers. That is what we are pumping into our waterworks. High chlorinization of the water might kill the germs but it does not take them out. Some specialists dealing with diseases of children will not permit their patients to use city water. Many adults are not permitted to use it. The poor, who cannot afford bottled water, must take their chances.

The conditions which I have described in the Ohio Valley are typical of other sections of the country. In some places they are worse, in other places not as bad, but there is no State in the Union that can be said to be entirely free from the menace of water pollution.

The bill before us today is a result of years of work on the part of Congress, extensive hearings having been held last year and in previous years by the Rivers and Harbors Committee. It is an improvement over the Barkley-Vinson bill, which was passed by the Seventy-fifth Congress, in that it limits Federal expenditures to a sum not to exceed $250,000 per year, to be used solely for administrative purposes. It eliminates entirely all political subdivisions, as well as private industry, from grants-in-aid, and it adds a member of the Army Engineer Corps to the governing board. The objection of the President to the Barkley-Vinson bill has been overcome in this bill.

On February 15, 1939, the President submitted a message to Congress in which he said that although he had vetoed the Barkley-Vinson bill for a technical reason, he fully subscribed to the general purposes of that act; and further said, "I hope that at this session the whole problem of water pollution may again receive your attention."

As far back as 1912, by a special act of Congress, the duties of the United States Public Health Service were broadened to include a study of stream pollution, with the result that we are today fortified with a quarter of a century of knowledge that has been gained by constant study of the problems of pollution by both the Public Health Service and the Army engineers.

Under the provisions of the bill now before us, no part of the maintenance cost of any project shall be borne by the Federal Government. Many cities have already made arrangements to proceed with sewage-treatment projects when given the assurance that the Federal Government will make it possible for other local subdivisions and industry to do likewise. The city of Cincinnati, for example, has recently approved a bond issue for sewage-disposal works and interceptor sewers. Incidentally, although many other bond issues were voted down, this particular bond issue was heartily approved by the voters of Cincinnati.

I believe that all who are familiar with the problem will agree that stream contamination has reached the stage where it may be classed as a major emergency. If all of the present hazards of polluted waterways were to suddenly descend upon us, it would be viewed as a national catastrophe, comparable to a serious epidemic or a great flood, and prompt and adequate action would be taken.

Favorable action by this House is all that remains to be done in order to set in motion the machinery that will afford protection to the health of millions. Should the House now fail to enact this measure into law, it will not only have reversed the action taken by the Seventy-fifth Congress but will have ignored two previous decisions of the Senate on the same subject, and will also have permitted to go unheeded the urgent request of the President contained in a special message sent to us earlier in the session. Further than that, the House will have rendered useless more than 25 years of intensive study on the part of the War Department engineers and the Public Health Service, and the health and lives of millions of persons in all sections of the country will be jeopardized.

Let us not be deluded by a plea that the bill should be amended so as to provide for mandatory enforcement by Federal injunction. Such an amendment would be an unwarranted encroachment upon States' rights and entirely unnecessary. It would likewise render the law of doubtful constitutionality. The zeal with which the States have entered into the interstate-compact agreements which were authorized by Congress is the best indication that the States individually and collectively will cooperate to make the law effective. The laws of the States as well as the compacts which they have entered into confer ample authority. We cannot attempt to enlarge upon that authority under the pretext of obtaining a stronger law. Let us not at this juncture attempt to confer upon the Federal Government the dubious authority to go about the country enjoining the various subdivisions of the States and industries wholly within those States. In the years to come, if we find that the States have not been able to cope with the problem, we can consider other remedies. [Applause.]

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HESS].

Mr. HESS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the city I come from and the district I represent is probably more interested in this legislation than any other section of our country.

We are located on the banks of the Ohio River, and the residents of Cincinnati and the surrounding territory receive their drinking-water supply from the waters of the Ohio River.

Our problem in Cincinnati is the problem of all the Kentucky cities across the Ohio River, such as Covington, Newport, Bellevue, and Dayton; also those cities down the river, such as Louisville, Ky., and Aurora, Lawrenceburg, and Evansville, Ind.

The Ohio River drainage basin includes 200,000 square miles, comprising parts of 14 States. The population of this basin is approximately 17,000,000. All of the larger cities on the main stem of the Ohio are placing their raw, untreated sewage in the river. River pollution also includes wastes from many industrial plants and mines. It is estimated that the many coal mines in the upper stretches of the river contribute 4,000,000 tons of sulfuric acid every year. In addition the entire range of industrial development is represented in processing mineral, agricultural, forest, and chemical products, resulting in every possible type of industrial waste contribution.

The raw, untreated sewage from nearly 5,800,000 persons and the treated sewage from nearly 2,400,000 additional persons is discharged daily into the Ohio River and its tributaries. Over 6,200,000 persons are supplied with water from the Ohio River and its tributaries, and 1,500,000 persons are supplied with water from the Ohio River itself. The concentration of bacterial pollution in the river water for many weeks at a time is far greater than that considered safe to be used as a source of public water supply, even when the water is treated by the most modern methods of filtration. These serious conditions prevail in successive river stretches from Pittsburgh, through Wheeling, Huntington, Portsmouth, Cincinnati, and Louisville, a river length of over 600 miles.

There has been an amazing increase in the pollution of raw Ohio River water for the last 15 years. The United States Public Health Service has found that a satisfactory raw water supply from a lake or river may have as many as 5,000 bacillus coli—germ from the lower bowel of red-blooded animals—per cubic centimeters, and be safely treated for use as drinking water. In August 1935 the bacillus coli count averaged 22,700, and by July 1938 the count hit 28,840, an all-time monthly high—safe limit, 5,000. All prior annual records were shattered during the year 1938 with an average of 10,580 count per 100 centimeters.

To keep pace with increasing pollution, the Cincinnati Water Works has just spent $3,250,000 to enlarge the facilities of the plant, and to improve its process for treatment. Health authorities hesitate to prophesy how much longer the water can be safely refined, if the pollution continues to increase as it has increased during the past 10 years.

We who live along the Ohio River and its tributaries have only once source of supply for the water we use daily, and that is the river water. The National Resources Committee informs us that, when the river is low, 1 quart out of every gallon of water flowing in the river has been through a sewer.

Something must be done to correct this evil and to protect the health of millions of our citizens. The time to act is now; we cannot delay action for another year; it may be too late. The bill before us is a step in the right direction. It is the beginning of the solution of a problem of paramount interest to millions of our citizens all over the United States.

Objection has been made to this legislation because it involves the annual expenditure of $250,000, to cover administration. Let us not be penny-wise and pound-foolish in this drive for economy. If the health of our citizens is not guarded, it will cost us hundreds of times this amount in doctors' and hospital bills in the future. This legislation will permit cities and industries to make loans at low rates of interest to construct sewage-disposal plants and industrial waste-disposal plants to protect our water supply. It is the best possible legislation we can hope to get at this time. It meets with the approval of the President of the United States, the United States Public Health Service, which will administer it, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which will make the loans, and it has passed the Senate without a record vote. There are also upward of 65 organizations throughout the United States interested in this subject which have placed their stamp of approval on this type of stream-pollution legislation. Let us hesitate no longer, but pass this bill on to the White House, where it may receive the Presidential signature and become law. The House of Representatives has a chance today to perform a real humanitarian act. [Applause.]

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to endorse everything my friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] has said about this bill. It relates to a subject in which I have been very much interested for the past 20 years. In 1916, I introduced a stream-pollution bill in the State Senate of Virginia. When the Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources was organized in the House in 1934, one of the first subjects we studied was that of stream pollution. I fully agree with my colleague from Michigan who said that this is not only a serious problem but a national problem. The Select Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources, in each of its reports to the House, has called attention to stream pollution both as a health problem and as a fishing problem, and as affecting the recreational use of our inland waters, and the committee has urged appropriate legislation on the subject.

Several years ago, when the so-called Barkley-Vinson bill was pending before the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I appeared at the request of the select committee of which I was chairman and testified before the committee at considerable length in behalf of that bill.

This matter has been before us so long now that no extended debate should be necessary. We all know pretty well what is involved. The main difference of opinion has been on whether we should adopt a rather conservative approach, an approach based upon study and investigation and to a large extent voluntary cooperation, or whether we should crack down on all the polluters, including our municipalities, and fix a dead line beyond which they cannot go, requiring them to eliminate all their pollution, even though, as Dr. Abel Wolman said, it may cost them from $2,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000 to do so.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. Is the gentleman from Virginia, who, I may say, is very sincere in his attitude toward these measures, favoring the bill S. 685, which is the Barkley bill, I believe, or is he favoring the proposed amendment which I understand is to be offered and which appears in the report of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will be frank with the gentleman. There have been very many changes in the various bills. Your committee has had before it four or five different bills, and it has brought out one or two different bills. Then, I believe the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] has introduced four or five more bills. It is difficult for me to keep up with all of them. The one I am now supporting, however, is the last one, and it is the one that is before us today, that is, the bill appearing in the report of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which, when offered as an amendment, will strike out all after the enacting clause of S. 685 and insert the new provision contained in the committee report. The bill provides for $250,000 for the Health Service to study this problem, with R. F. C. loans to those who want to put in sewage treatment plants or industrial waste elimination plants.

Mr. CARTER. As I understand, that bill is not yet before the committee and cannot come before the committee in a parliamentary manner until after it is offered as an amendment. It has not yet been offered as an amendment. The bill that is before the committee at the present time is S. 685, without the amendment offered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am for the bill that the committee will offer later. I may say that while I have not had an opportunity to study carefully an additional amendment, which I understand the committee will offer or accept, I am in sympathy with its general purpose, that is, to prevent future pollution from new sources which is clearly unnecessary and so declared to be by the agency we set up to study and handle that problem.

There is one phase of that so-called Mundt amendment that I hope the committee will consider carefully before the exact language of the amendment is adopted. I refer to new pollution that can occur from any municipal sewage after the enactment of this law.

Take, for instance, a little town of 10,000 that may have a big factory or two factories located in it and within a year grow to 20,000. Would that be new pollution? If so, that little town may not have the money to put in immediately a sewage-treatment plant, yet, under this law, it would be subject to prosecution, conducted by the district attorney, if it did not do so, unless it be clear that the words "new source" mean a different source. That is one phase of the proposed amendment that has been shown me that I think should be carefully considered before it is bodily included in the substitute which I understand will later be offered by the acting chairman of the committee.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. The reason for a moderate approach to this problem is that the public itself is the great offender and not industry?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Of course, from the health standpoint, it is the typhoid and other germs that go from city sewers into our streams that must be used as sources of drinking water. That will, of course, always have to be a major consideration in respect of legislation of this kind from the standpoint of public health. Also, as a fisherman, I am very much interested in the problem from that standpoint, and the recreational use of our inland waters.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. Does not the gentleman think that the diversity of views largely comes from the diversity of geographical locations? In other words, it is generally recognized that a drastic bill could not be applied to the cities of the Ohio Valley, but such powers might very well be applied to the broad, open spaces of some of the West, where there is, say, a sawmill every 20 miles dumping its waste, and such a provision would enjoin the sawmill from continuing to dump its waste into the stream.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Well, the West has cities and the West has industry, and from no section of the country would there come any united support for a drastic bill now that would say to industry that "At such-and-such time you close down in this respect or we will put you out of business."

Mr. SPENCE. I recognize that the West has some of the finest cities in the country; but there are also fine open spaces, as the district of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] would probably demonstrate, and it might be that his bill would be applicable to the few sawmills in his country but would not be applicable to the Ohio Valley.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I would not like to inquire into just why he is supporting his particular legislation. It may be he puts recreational use and health above the needs of industry in this respect; but be that as it may, I think we are pretty well agreed in this House that we are going to have a bill along the lines of the bill that is to be presented to us by the committee, with the possible addition of an amendment affecting new sources of pollution; and, personally, I hope very much the House favorably acts on that type of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, the Rivers and Harbors Committee greatly regret that the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas, Judge MANSFIELD, is unable to be present today by reason of ill health. This to be regretted, as he is a technician in the field of controlling water pollution and is fully alive to that problem. I am glad to announce that his illness is not serious and that he will be back in the harness shortly. The Congress greatly needs the services and sound counsel of that great American at this time. [Applause.] I am able to state that he is strongly for the committee bill and believes that the legislation proposed by his committee is the sane effective approach to the question of pollution of our waterways.

Every citizen of the United States who is concerned with the public health is animated by a desire to conserve the wildlife resources of the country and to promote the use of our rivers and streams for recreational purposes and is vitally concerned in the control of pollution of public waters. Every group that has studied this question are of one mind—that as a civilization grows older this menace to the well-being of our people grows more threatening.

The third report of the Special Advisory Committee on Water Pollution contains some alarming but interesting data regarding the present status of the pollution problem. Seventy-three million people of the United States are served by public sewage systems. This sewered population discharges daily approximately five and three-quarter million gallons of liquid waste, all of which finds its way, treated or untreated, into the streams, lakes, or tidal estuaries. The sewage from 37,000,000 people, representing about 54 percent of the sewered population, is at the present time treated either by sedimentation or otherwise. This leaves approximately two and one-half billion gallons of sewage which are discharged daily in an untreated condition into our water courses. In the field of mining about 2,700,000 tons of sulfuric acid enter our streams as drainage from bituminous mines. The acid drainage from anthracite mines constitutes a similar offense. It is estimated that 10,000,000,000 barrels of brine, about one-half of which finds its way into our streams, are produced daily in the oil fields.

The industrial plants of the country of every name and description are daily discharging into the streams and lakes great quantities of waste which renders the water unsuitable for industrial purposes and prevents recreational use of the streams.

These conditions should be cured. All thinking Americans are alive to this fact. What is the probable cost of the correction of these conditions? It is estimated that an additional expenditure of approximately $1,000,000,000 will be required for municipal surface treatment; $52,000,000 for the control of coal-mine drainage and not less than $100,000,000 for the treatment of oil-field brine. The treatment of industrial wastes will involve an added disbursement of $900,000,000. It is further estimated that the annual operating and maintenance cost for new surface-treatment plants will amount to at least $15,000,000, while the fixed and operating charges for the treatment of mining, oil fields, and industrial wastes will probably exceed $225,000,000 per year.

The House will see that this represents a colossal disbursement which, if carried on ruthlessly, would dislocate our national economy and do violence to wages and pay rolls which carry subsistence to millions of our countrymen. The problem is present and pressing and two schools of thought are now contending to write the law which shall clean up this menacing national condition.

The Rivers and Harbors Committee present a bill here today which represents a moderate but effective approach to these problems. This bill has the endorsement of practically every health body in the United States. It bears the imprimatur of the American Medical Association and has the solid backing of the United States Public Health Service. The representatives of these bodies appeared before our committee and wholeheartedly approved the principles of the bill which is presented here today.

The bill provides for the creation of a Division of Water Pollution in the United States Public Health Service. It further provides for the zoning of the country and establishes the Public Health Service as the contact agency between the various States on interstate pollution control. To date there has been no interstate jurisdiction of this question. The history of it has been that while some States are mindful of the necessity of pollution control, another State upstream has not developed any civic conscience on the question. The bill provides for an appropriation of $215,000 annually and for loans from the R. F. C. The bill does not provide for any grants. This bill bridges over that hiatus and enables the States through the medium of the Federal Government to get together on some sane concerted attack on this question. This bill was born of much discussion and represents substantially the viewpoint of the committee, which has conducted full hearings on the subject and heard all parties in interest.

The committee legislation has the added value of writing into the law the viewpoint of the public-health agencies who have been fighting this problem from the beginning. They are practical men and realize that pay rolls are necessary to an ordered national economy. They further realize that this great problem must be approached sanely and without violence.

A bill embodying these general features was passed by the House and Senate, but was subsequently vetoed by the President on the ground that it did not comply with his budgetary views. The present bill meets his views in the financial provisions, and he will, I am advised, sign the bill in its present form.

There is another school of thought on this question. It is presented by the Mundt bill, which has the backing of certain sportsmen's and conservation groups. I have great respect for the idealism and charm of the proponent of that measure, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. He is an extremely useful Member of the House, and no one can question his fine ability and high service to the country; nor do I question the idealism of the Izaak Walton Society and similar groups, who are urging the passage of drastic legislation on this question. These gentlemen are true nature lovers and are imbued with a strong desire to keep our open spaces free from the taint and waste of civilization.

As I spell it out, these gentlemen would write into law a provision that by injunction proceedings, or mandamus, the offending manufacturers, the miners, and oil refiners should be estopped from continuing the pollution of our waters. The proposition is clothed in weasel words, but that is the effect of it. Under the Mundt proposal a bureaucracy at Washington could ultimately enjoin these groups from operating and thus throw millions of men out of work. By virtue of this proposal a million lawsuits could be started, and, as I view it, blackmail would be the order of the day. The manufacturer, particularly the small manufacturer, upon whose pay rolls of the well-being of our people largely depends, would be haled into court, and a lawyer's holiday would result. This proposed law would, of course, be unenforceable and in most jurisdictions would be declared unconstitutional under the rule of reason. The gentleman from Texas, Judge MANSFIELD, placed an extension in the Appendix of the RECORD the other day which told the history of drastic legislation of this type. He stated that most of the States had passed drastic legislation of this character, and all of it was a dead letter. Neither the courts, juries, nor public officers are going to place people in the bread line so that fishing may be improved.

The health officers of the various States and the Federal Government know that such legislation as this always dies aborning and is nothing more than a futile gesture. I am for the House bill and urge the Committee to pass it in its present form. It represents the best national thought on the question. It creates a Division of Water Pollution Control in the Public Health Service. It constitutes no invasion of States' rights, and the paralyzing hand of bureaucracy cannot lay its hand on the manufacturing plants of America. It places the handling of this question in the hands of the United States Public Health Service and the State health departments. I have great regard for the United States Army engineers, but the personnel of the United States Public Health Service are experts in the field of stream pollution. They have been at it for many years, and they will approach the interstate phase of this great problem with effectiveness and without doing violence to local needs.

I respectfully urge the House to support the Barkley-Mansfield bill. It will be a big approach to the solution of this problem and will bring about a gradual and certain cure of this problem.

I am now advised that the distinguished and able gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] will offer an amendment relating to new sources of pollution and will not oppose the pending bill if that is accepted. I urge the passage of his amendment and congratulate him upon his fine sportsmanship. I think the conservationists and sportsmen for whom the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] so ably speaks are likewise the subjects of hearty congratulation. Under our joint auspices I know that pollution in America will be tremendously lessened. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I will yield to the gentleman now for a relevant question.

Mr. CARTER. I want some information relative to the so-called Mundt amendment.

Mr. CULKIN. I said I would yield for a relevant question.

Mr. CARTER. That amendment reads in part as follows:

After date of enactment of this act no new sources of pollution, either by sewage or industrial waste, shall be permitted to be discharged into the navigable waters of the United States and streams—

And so forth. Suppose a factory has temporarily suspended and this bill then goes into effect—will it be affected by the Mundt amendment?

Mr. CULKIN. Oh, the gentleman is seeing ghosts.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CULKIN. No. I am sorry. The gentleman must know that that question is absurd. Whatever the vested rights of the factory were prior to the enactment of this law will be preserved.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I am very much inclined to favor such legislation as this, provided it is not too drastic. The gentleman does not think the passage of the bill before us will stop the wheels of industry or be unduly rash and harsh in regard to industries now functioning?

Mr. CULKIN. It will not. It would not affect or lessen the pay rolls of any plant. We can conserve them and at the same time make a rational approach to this question.

May I say this: You do not come to know about these things by accident, although some people think you do. Every bar fly knows more about questions that confront us here and which we have heard in committee week after week than we do. I was impressed in the hearings with the rational attitude of industry in America on this question. I think they see the handwriting on the wall, and they are going to cooperate. I think there will not be any problem under this legislation. You can get more enforcement by this bill than you can by any mandamus or injunctive procedure. That is the pathway to complete inaction.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one-half minute.

Mr. CULKIN. Make it snappy. I only have half a minute.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is more time than some of us could get on this very important bill, which we are very much concerned about. The gentleman mentioned the situation in Connecticut.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman should not scold me. I am giving the gentleman my half minute. The sands are running quickly. [Laughter.]

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman mentioned the situation in Connecticut and Massachusetts, that those people are not able to comply. Under this bill, will you be able to compel them to comply?

Mr. CULKIN. You cannot compel them; no. But the weight of public opinion and the influence of the technical leadership will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a step in the right direction. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] pointed out to the members of the Committee the number of organizations which are backing this legislation. I could give you numerous others in almost every State in the Union which are asking for this type of legislation to be enacted at this time. You know we spent a lot of money to get rid of fruit insects, in fact, we spend $412,000 a year. We spend $395,000 a year for Japanese beetle control. We spend $70,000 a year to get rid of the sweetpotato weevil, and $375,000 a year to control the gypsy and brown-tail moth; and we should. We spend $680,000 for foreign-plant quarantine. As a matter of fact, over $5,000,000 a year is appropriated to the Bureau of Entomology to exterminate these insects. Then, too, we spend money to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease, tuberculosis and Bang's disease, and for grasshopper control, as I am reminded by my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]. We have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars. My good friend from California [Mr. CARTER], who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, votes for those expenditures, and it is entirely proper that he should vote for them. All we are asking for here is $250,000 for administering this law and making it possible for these communities, these public agencies, to borrow money to provide themselves with sewage plants and with proper equipment to get rid of this menace.

In Ohio we have eradicated about 50 percent of it. There is still 50 percent to go. As long as human lives are at stake as a result of this nuisance, it is essential that this bill be passed.

As the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] pointed out, public sentiment will force those agencies to take advantage of these low-interest loans provided for in this measure.

I hope that the Members of this House, including our good friend from California [Mr. CARTER], will see the light and will vote to put over this meritorious measure that has been approved by every member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, save one. With the Mundt amendment, as explained and outlined by the gentleman from South Dakota a while ago, even those organizations and agencies which found the bill objectionable will find occasion to go along with it.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I doubt frankly whether any man in this House is more in favor of a proper bill against pollution of our streams than I am. In my own district I have had plenty of evidence of the necessity for many years. It is not only not a new thing to me, but an old, unfortunate one. I am in agreement with the spirit of the bill under discussion here. I objected to the method of procedure for the rule, I think perfectly justly, because it is a practice that seems to have grown up in the House that unless you are a member of the committee in charge of a bill, you have no opportunity of expressing your opinion one way or the other, even though your research may have gone to a very great extent in the direction covered by the bill.

I think that is the wrong spirit. I protested against it, and I protest now. It seems to me that the chairman and minority members of the committee ought always to see to it that the spirit of this House is honored and respected. The idea is to give half the time to those who are for a bill and half the time to those who are against a bill, and that custom should be followed.

Now, back to the bill itself.

I believe in the cooperative spirit of this bill. I do not believe, at the present time, that it would be advisable at all to put down the mailed fist. I think we ought to do everything we can to assist those cities and communities which are not otherwise able to pay their own way, to help them provide their own sewage systems, because I know the spirit of my own district. Unfortunate as the economic condition is at the present time they want to do away with stream pollution as well as anyone under the sun.

I am going to support the spirit of this bill, and I hope the bill will be amended in such way as to deserve my final support.

Mr. PARSONS. I would be glad to have the gentleman explain the type of amendment he would like to see adopted.

Mr. KELLER. I am going to refer to that right away.

I have in my district, as some of you know, a great coal-mining region. Into a small stream, the Big Muddy River, all the raw sewage of 100,000 population is poured, and it is not difficult to understand what the condition is below the place of entry. I know it thoroughly from many years of observation and experience. I am, therefore, going to do what I can to see to it that a rational bill is put forward here—one that will meet the conditions and that will be national in scope. I want to point out, however, on page 3 of this new bill—that we are not considering now—the first sentence, beginning with "encourage compacts between the several States," and then following that, subsection (c):

(c) The consent of the Congress is hereby given to two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts, not in conflict with any law of the United States, for cooperative effort and mutual assistance for the prevention and abatement of water pollution and the enforcement of their respective laws relating thereto, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts.

The sentence quoted from subsection (b) should be eliminated, and all of subsection (c) should be eliminated for the simple reason that the Constitution of the United States provides for the entering into of compacts between the States. If the consent of Congress is given in advance that States may enter into compacts Congress has lost the power to modify those compacts afterward. That power is taken away from Congress entirely. That is not in keeping with the spirit of our times because no man can foresee what ought to be done as these things develop. This question of stream pollution is a national question and should always remain in control of the Federal Government.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes; for a question only.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is not in favor, then, of the bill that is under consideration, the Senate bill?

Mr. KELLER. I think perhaps they have it better in this new bill as far as I am able to read it, the one which is to be offered as a substitute for S. 865. I hope the gentleman will read my statement and give it careful consideration. Unless somebody else does, I shall present amendments for consideration of this body, eliminating those unfortunate provisions in regard to compacts between States. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I have carefully analyzed this bill. This is what you term popular legislation because in the end your State and my State, if the bill becomes a law, will get something for nothing, at least that is the thought of many who urge its passage. On the contrary at least some of the States will foot the bill. I refer to those States whose contributions to the Federal Treasury exceed the gratuities that are passed out in various forms.

To my way of thinking this law will soon be as popular as the act providing Federal aid for the construction of roads.

Remember this is an authorization bill. Section 1 sets up another bureau within a bureau known, however, as a division. I speak now of the substitute which will be offered I understand, by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Section 2 provides the set-up, the duties, and if you will read it carefully you will see how far-reaching the legislation is. In cooperation with other government agencies plans will be prepared for eliminating or reducing pollution of navigable streams of the United States and waters tributary thereto. This covers all waters in the country with the exception of lakes, as all streams eventually empty into navigable rivers and bays.

In this section you also find the bait. Specifically mentioned you find the plans must have due regard for improvements which are necessary to conserve such waters and promote for their public use for water supplies, propagation of fish, and aquatic life, recreational purposes, agricultural, industrial, and other legitimate uses.

This division, upon request of any State health authority, shall conduct investigations and make surveys of any specific problem of water pollution, confronting any State, community or municipality, and make definite recommendations for the correction and elimination of pollution. The division must further, under provisions of the House bill, make a periodic test of the water at any and all bathing beaches.

Is it any wonder that we all have received letters calling upon us to vote for the stream pollution bill. The lure extends to the fishermen, the State engineers, and contractors, and many others. The House bill provides for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The original House bill gave us some idea how far reaching the law will be because it provided for an appropriation of $50,000,000 annually. But do not forget the Senate bill has no limitation as to amount. The language in the Senate bill paragraph (e) of Section 7 authorizes to be appropriated annually such sums as may be necessary in the form of grants-in-aid and loans. Think of it, no limitation whatsoever, and remember, no matter what kind of a bill the House passes the bill goes to conference. Between the language in the House bill and the Senate bill the conferees will certainly have unlimited discretion. I predict that, in the end, you will have a conference report that will practically saddle, on the Federal Government, the entire cost of eliminating stream pollution.

Those of you who are insisting upon a reduction in expenditures should stop, look, and listen.

When the taxpayer wakes up to what Congress is doing in this legislation you will hear plenty. Now the propaganda is one-sided, all in favor of the bill. The taxpayer expects us to protect them from Treasury raids.

To hear me talk undoubtedly you would be justified in saying I am opposed to stopping stream pollution. On the contrary I am for it but I do not feel it is the duty of the Federal Government to assume the responsibility and burden in bringing it about.

We legislate for the District of Columbia. I happen to be the author of the law that provided the District government could borrow up to $8,000,000 to construct a sewage-disposal plant so as to stop pollution of the Potomac River. What happened as a result of my bill? The District Commissioners provided for a three-and-one-half-million-dollar project about one-third of which was a grant from the P. W. A., not in my mind a sufficient amount to properly take care of the situation. Only a few moments ago I talked to the sanitary engineer of the District. I asked him what results have been accomplished. He replied it was working fine. I wanted to know why the Potomac was still subject to pollution near Georgetown. He replied he knew of no pollution there. Why there is a sewer that goes under the driveway along the Potomac and when I pass that place every morning the river is full of gulls. If the Potomac was not being polluted at that point why would the gulls be at the mouth of that sewer? He promised to investigate.

Regardless of whether it is functioning properly, I cite my efforts to stop pollution in the Potomac as evidence I favor elimination of untreated sewage.

The bill provides $250,000 for additional help but it further provides for the detail of engineers and experts of any Government agency to assist the new division, those detailed to be paid from the appropriations of the offices to which they are now assigned. The question is just how large a personnel would be needed to carry out the provisions of the bill. The $250,000 is only a starter. The build-up for this popular agency will be fast and furious.

This legislation goes too far. We should remember the activities that properly belong to the State that the Government has already taken over and not add to that list.

There is a provision in the bill the Congress can call for surveys. Provisions similar to those in the River and Harbor Act. Congress will call for surveys, reports will be made to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and then you will have an omnibus bill to stop stream pollution just as you have an omnibus bill to improve rivers and harbors.

A year ago I led the fight against the Vinson-Barkley bill. My efforts appeared hopeless at the outset but on a roll call I was only defeated by a few votes. Fortunately the President vetoed that bill. That was in 1939. Now in 1940 you have another bill.

I fear the ultimate result if this legislation passes. Recall what happened to Federal aid for roads. Congress started with an appropriation of $75,000,000 for the first 5 years. Five million the first year, ten million the second, fifteen the third year, twenty the fourth year, and twenty-five millions the fifth year. That was the start. Look at the finish. That was not so long ago. Look where we are now. Not counting the special appropriations our average appropriation for Federal-aid highways is now around $125,000,000. That is what will happen under such legislation as this. The time to prevent it is now. This bill should be defeated and I hope it is. [Applause.]

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ZIMMERMAN, having resumed the Chair, Mr. O'NEAL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 685) to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MELVIN JOSEPH MAAS, JR.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2½ minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the House should adjourn today without appropriate recognition of a joyous event which occurred at 4:50 this morning at Providence Hospital when Melvin Joseph Maas, Jr., or plain Joseph Maas, as the name will finally be determined, began his mundane career under favorable auspices, weight 7½ pounds, muscles and vocal organs in fine trim, the first leap year baby of the crop of 1940 to be born in the Capital City of our Nation.

At last accounts the baby's father, our beloved colleague the gentleman from Minnesota, Representative MELVIN J. MAAS, was doing well, in possession of all of his faculties, proudly conscious of the honor that goes with the parenthood of an only son. When he came down from the stratosphere long enough to be interviewed he said that he was uncertain whether he would bring up his boy to be a general in the Marine Corps or an admiral in the Navy.

Though young in age and experience, Melvin Joseph, or Joseph, as the case may be, gave lusty evidence of his faith in the principles of the political party to which he belongs, which led his attendants rather to believe that he will be neither a general nor an admiral when he grows up but a worthy Member of this great legislative body in which his father has served so long and with such outstanding distinction.

I hold in my hand a picture taken today of the gentleman from Minnesota, Representative MAAS, with his offspring in his arms, and I defy anyone who looks at that picture to say that our colleague is not satisfied. Let us show our affectionate regard for the father and salute the son by giving both a rousing hand. [Applause.]

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Proposed amendment to S. 685, an act to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes: In S. 685, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby established in the United States Public Health Service a Division of Water Pollution Control (hereinafter referred to as the Division). The Division shall be in charge of a Director, who shall be a commissioned engineer officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed for such duty by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service (hereinafter referred to as the Surgeon General). Such engineer officer, while serving as Director, shall have the rank of an Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, subject to the provisions of law applicable to Assistant Surgeons General in charge of administrative divisions in the District of Columbia of the Public Health Service.

"SEC. 2. (a) The Division shall, after careful investigation, and in cooperation with the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, other Federal agencies, and the agencies of the several States authorized by law or duly designated to deal with water pollution, and in cooperation with the municipalities and industries involved, prepare comprehensive plans for eliminating or reducing the pollution and improving the sanitary condition of the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto. In the development of such comprehensive plans, due regard shall be given to the improvements which are necessary to conserve such waters and promote their use for public water supplies, propagation of fish and aquatic life, recreational purposes, agricultural, industrial, and other legitimate uses, and for this purpose the Division is authorized to make joint investigations with the aforesaid agencies of the Federal Government and any State or States of the condition of any waters of the United States, either navigable or otherwise, and of the discharges of any sewage, industrial wastes, or substance which may deleteriously affect such waters.

"(b) The Division shall encourage cooperative activities by the several States for the prevention and abatement of water pollution; encourage the enactment of uniform State laws relating to water pollution; encourage compacts between the several States for the prevention and abatement of water pollution; collect and disseminate information; make available to State agencies, municipalities, industries, and individuals the results of such surveys, studies, investigations, and experiments conducted by the Division and by other agencies, public and private; and furnish such assistance to State agencies as may be authorized by law.

any law of the United States, for cooperative effort and mutual assistance for the prevention and abatement of water pollution and the enforcement of their respective laws relating thereto, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts.

"SEC. 3. "SEC. 5. Every loan or purchase of securities by Reconstruction Finance Corporation to finance the construction of treatment works shall hereafter be made only upon the recommendation of the State health authority having jurisdiction and upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General and his certification that such construction is necessary to prevent the discharge of untreated or inadequately treated sewage or other waste which would substantial'y impair the quality of any waters of the United States.

In the consideration of such proposed treatment works and projects the Board shall have in view the benefits to be derived by the construction thereof in accomplishing the purpose of this act, and the relation of the ultimate cost of such works, both as to the cost of construction and maintenance, to the public interests involved, the public necessity for such works, and the adequacy of the provisions made or agreed upon by the applicant for the loan for assuring proper and efficient operation and maintenance of the works after completion of the construction thereof. The Board shall, when it considers the same necessary, and with the approval and under orders from the Surgeon General, make as a board or through its members, personal examinations of localities where the proposed treatment works are to be located. All plants, costs estimates, information, and arguments which are presented to the Board for its consideration in connection with any matter referred to it by the Surgeon General shall be reduced to and submitted in writing, and shall be made a part of the records of the Office of the Surgeon General.

"(b) As soon as practicable the Board shall classify the navigable waters of the continental United States into districts to be known as sanitary water districts. The Board shall fix and define the boundaries of each such district and may from time to time alter such boundaries. The areas of such districts shall, insofar as practicable, conform to the areas of watersheds not wholly contained within the boundaries of one State.

"(c) All special reports ordered by the Congress pursuant to the provisions of this act shall, at the discretion of the Surgeon General, be reviewed in like manner by the said Board; and the said Board shall also, on request by resolution of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives submitted to the Surgeon General, examine and review the report of any examination, investigation, survey, or project for the elimination or reduction of water pollution or for the construction of treatment works made pursuant to any act or resolution of the Congress, and shall report through the Surgeon General, who shall submit its conclusions thereon through the Federal Security Administrator and the President as in other cases.

Not exceeding 10 engineer officers in the reserve of the Public Health Service may be ordered to active duty for such periods of time as may be desirable, extending not more than 5 years beyond the date of enactment of this act, to assist in carrying out the purpose thereof.

"(b) Such clerks, stenographers, and other employees as may be necessary to discharge the duties of the Division and for the investigations in the field shall be appointed by the Federal Security Administrator in accordance with the civil-service laws and their compensation shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and he shall prescribe such rules and regulations with respect to their duties as he may find necessary.

"(c) The personnel of the Public Health Service paid from any appropriation not made pursuant to section 7 may be detailed to assist in carrying out the purpose of this act.

"(d) The Federal Security Administrator, with the consent of the head of any other executive department of the Federal Government, may utilize such officers and employees of said department as may be found necessary to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 11. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most gracious God, we praise Thee that the essence of life is divine. Made in His image is the immortal word in the front door of Thy Holy Book. Help us not to belittle the past nor curtain the future. This old, old truth may we never deny. It is as ancient as the heart of the Almighty, yet as new as the last aspiration that reaches the throne of grace. Not in dumb resignation, dear Lord, do we lift our hearts in prayer, but to enjoy the unbroken inflows of fresh, new wonder while eternity's flame burns deep in our breasts. Do Thou impart to blind, mortal eyes the abiding assurance that, however dark the night, the shadow-draped hills but conceal the brighter dawn. Inspire us to unveil the cross and see infinite love struggling for expression and learn that mercy is greater than sacrifice and that truth is more wonderful than fiction. Blessed be Thy holy name; these will live until the stars grow cold and the leaves of the judgment book unfold. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 424. Joint resolution to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to acquire certain lands at St. Petersburg, Fla.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 643. An act authorizing the payment of necessary expenses incurred by certain Indians allotted on the Quinaielt Reservation, State of Washington; and

S. 1935. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The Speaker laid before the House the following resignation from committee:

FEBRUARY 29, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
Speaker, United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Very sincerely,

JOE B. BATES.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

CONTESTED ELECTION—NEAL AGAINST KEFAUVER

The Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House, which was read, and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1, and ordered to be printed:

FEBRUARY 29, 1940.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: This office has unofficial knowledge of the bringing of a contest growing out of the special election held September 13, 1939, to fill the vacancy in the Seventy-sixth Congress from the Third Congressional District of the State of Tennessee.

On October 19, 1939, John R. Neal served notice on Estes Kefauver, returned Member from the Third Congressional District of the State of Tennessee, of his purpose to contest the election of said Kefauver. Now comes the sitting Member, Estes Kefauver, in communication to me under date of February 23, 1940, moving to dismiss the said contest and sets forth the reasons therefor.

For the information of the House the Clerk deems it proper to state that no testimony in behalf of either party has been filed in this office as required and in the manner prescribed by law. The time prescribed by law for the taking of testimony having long since expired and no testimony having been transmitted to the Clerk of the House, it would, therefore, appear that this case has abated.

The motion to dismiss the contest is submitted herewith for the consideration of the appropriate committee.

Very truly yours,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.
By H. NEWLIN MEGILL.

MESSENGER TO HOUSE RADIO PRESS GALLERY

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution (H. Res. 355), as follows:

Resolved, That House Resolution 199, adopted by the House of Representatives on May 23, 1939, is amended by striking out the comma following the word "gallery" and the words "the services of the messenger to be provided only during the session of the Congress."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution merely places the messenger to the radio gallery on an annual basis rather than on a monthly basis while Congress is in session. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and following the legislative program of the day and the address of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

EXCESS RESERVES OF BANKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the excess reserve of banks and that the banks are just bursting with money. At the end of 1939 all the member banks in this Nation had excess reserves aggregating $5,166,566,000, but of this $5,166,563,000, $3,002,856,000 is in a few banks in New York City. So, from 80 to 85 percent of these excess reserves are in five States. It is not a very healthy situation for them to be concentrated in the hands of a few people in a few large banks. Upon these excess reserves loans equal to 7 to 1 can be made. But most of the reserves are in one city, and without a stock-market boom—which we do not want for the purpose of inflation—they will not be put to work. If these reserves were distributed in a better way among all the banks of the Nation, more loans and of the proper kind would be made. I repeat that it is against the interest of the country for a few men, who control a few banks, to control the value of money, which establishes the value of everything else. The problems of money and monopoly have not been solved. Last week the excess reserves of member banks increased $60,000,000, but all this increase was in New York City banks.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter and certain tables on excess reserves which were prepared by Mr. E. A. Goldenweiser, Director of Research and Statistics of the Federal Reserve Board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The letter and matter referred to are as follows:

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, February 28, 1940.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PATMAN: In reply to your request of February 19, I am enclosing four tables giving the following statistics:

1. Required reserves, excess reserves, and the percentage of excess reserves to required reserves at the end of each year, 1934–39, for central reserve city member banks, reserve city member banks, and country member banks.

2. Balances carried by the various groups of banks on deposit with other domestic banks, and also deposits held by member banks for other domestic banks at the end of each year, 1934–39.

3. Required reserves and excess reserves for the three classes of member banks before and after the four dates on which reserve requirements were changed.

4. Excess reserves of member banks by individual States for the end of 1939.

The percentage of excess reserves to required reserves is given in table 1 for each class of member bank, because these percentage figures show the relative distribution of excess reserves. In analyzing the distribution of excess reserves by classes of member banks account should be taken of the amount of balances carried with correspondent banks, because banks, and particularly country banks, deposit a large amount of their idle funds with banks in other cities. As shown in table 2, balances carried by country member banks with their correspondents are now at the record level of $2,600,000,000. This may be compared with an average level of about $1,000,000,000 during the period 1924–31. Reserve city banks also carry substantial balances with correspondents, but at the same time they hold balances for other banks, and withdrawal of the latter is likely to be met by drawing upon the former. New York City banks, which have the largest amounts of excess reserves, also hold very large deposits of other banks. In effect, New York banks are carrying part of the excess reserves of other banks.

If there is any more information you need, do not hesitate to call on us.

Very truly yours,

E. A. GOLDENWEISER,
Director of Research and Statistics.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have asked for this time, Mr. Speaker, to inquire as to the program for next week. I wonder if the Chair would take the House into his confidence at this time on that matter?

The SPEAKER. In answer to the inquiry, the Chair may say that, of course, it is the custom for the majority leader to make such announcements, but, inasmuch as he is temporarily detained with a cold, the Chair takes the liberty of stating that the program, as far as any program has been arranged, will be this: On Monday next, of course, there will be the call of the Consent Calendar and suspensions, if any. The Chair will state that at this time he has it in mind not to recognize any Member for suspensions. It is hoped that on Monday afternoon, or at least on Tuesday, we will begin consideration of the Interior Department appropriation bill, which will probably consume 2 or 3 days. That is as far as any program has been arranged for next week.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement by Commissioner Collier on S. 3083.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement by Russell B. Brown before the Cole subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE BY TEXAS

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the House is not likely to be in session tomorrow, and inasmuch as March 2 is the one hundred and fourth anniversary of the declaration of independence by Texas, I have asked for this minute to say a few words and to present a unanimous-consent request.

In its statement of grievances the declaration of independence by Texas resembles in many respects the Declaration of Independence written by Thomas Jefferson for the Thirteen Colonies. It is a very important and significant American historical document. In its consequences it had a vast effect upon the development of this country in which we live. I believe it has never been made generally available for perusal by the people of this country or even by the Members of Congress. The original of this declaration is in the capitol building in Austin. I have a copy of this document, which is comparatively brief, and in view of its importance and significance I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that it may be included in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

THE UNANIMOUS DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE MADE BY THE DELEGATES OF THE PEOPLE OF TEXAS IN GENERAL CONVENTION AT THE TOWN OF WASHINGTON ON THE 2D DAY OF MARCH 1836

When a government has ceased to protect the lives, liberty, and property of the people, from whom its legitimate powers are derived, and for the advancement of whose happiness it was instituted; and, so far from being a guaranty for the enjoyment of their inestimable and inalienable rights, becomes an instrument in the hands of evil rulers for their oppression. When the Federal republican constitution of their country, which they have sworn to support, no longer has a substantial existence; and the whole nature of their government has been forcibly changed, without their consent, from a restricted federative republic, composed of sovereign States, to a consolidated, central, military despotism in which every interest is disregarded but that of the army and the priesthood—both the eternal enemies of civil liberty, the ever-ready minions of power, and the usual instruments of tyrants. When, long after the spirit of the constitution has departed, moderation is, at length, so far lost by those in power that even the semblance of freedom is removed, and the forms themselves of the constitution discontinued; and, so far from their petitions and remonstrances being regarded, the agents who bear them are thrown into dungeons, and mercenary armies sent forth to force a new government upon them at the point of the bayonet. When, in consequence of such acts of malfeasance and abdication on the part of the government, anarchy prevails and civil society is dissolved into its original elements. In such a crisis the first law of Nature, the right of self-preservation—the inherent and inalienable right of the people to appeal to first principles and take their political affairs into their own hands in extreme cases—enjoins it, as a right toward themselves and a sacred obligation to their posterity, to abolish such government and create another in its stead, calculated to rescue them from impending dangers and to secure their future welfare and happiness.

Nations, as well as individuals, are amenable for their acts to the public opinion of mankind. A statement of a part of our grievances is, therefore, submitted to an impartial world in justification of the hazardous but unavoidable step now taken of severing our political connection with the Mexican people and assuming an independent attitude among the nations of the earth.

The Mexican Government, by its colonization laws, invited and induced the Anglo-American population of Texas to colonize its wilderness, under the pledged faith of a written constitution that they should continue to enjoy that constitutional liberty and republican government to which they had been habituated in the land of their birth, the United States of America.

In this expectation they have been cruelly disappointed, inasmuch as the Mexican Nation has acquiesced in the late changes made in the Government by Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, who, having overturned the constitution of his country, now offers us the cruel alternative either to abandon our homes, acquired by so many privations, or submit to the most intolerable of all tyranny—the combined despotism of the sword and the priesthood.

It has sacrificed our welfare to the State of Coahuila, by which our interests have been continually depressed through a jealous and partial course of legislation carried on at a far-distant seat of government by a hostile majority in an unknown tongue; and this, too, notwithstanding we have petitioned in the humblest terms for the establishment of a separate State government, and have, in accordance with the provisions of the national constitution, presented to the General Congress a republican constitution, which was, without just cause, contemptuously rejected.

It incarcerated in a dungeon for a long time one of our citizens, for no other cause but a zealous endeavor to procure the acceptance of our constitution and the establishment of a State government.

It has failed and refused to secure, on a firm basis, the right of trial by jury—that palladium of civil liberty, and only safe guaranty for the life, liberty, and property of the citizen.

It has failed to establish any public system of education, although possessed of almost boundless resources (the public domain), and although it is an axiom in political science that unless a people are educated and enlightened, it is idle to expect the continuance of civil liberty or the capacity for self-government.

It has suffered the military commandants stationed among us to exercise arbitrary acts of oppression and tyranny, thus trampling upon the most sacred rights of the citizen and rendering the military superior to the civil power.

It has dissolved, by force of arms, the State Congress of Coahuila and Texas and obliged our representatives to fly for their lives from the seat of government, thus depriving us of the fundamental political right of representation.

It has demanded the surrender of a number of our citizens and ordered military detachments to seize and carry them into the interior for trial, in contempt of the civil authorities and in defiance of the laws and the constitution.

It has made piratical attacks upon our commerce by commissioning foreign desperadoes and authorizing them to seize our vessels and convey the property of our citizens to far distant ports for confiscation.

It denies us the right of worshiping the Almighty according to the dictates of our own conscience by the support of a national religion calculated to promote the temporal interest of its human functionaries rather than the glory of the true and living God.

It has demanded us to deliver up our arms, which are essential to our defense, the rightful property of freemen, and formidable only to tyrannical governments.

It has invaded our country, both by sea and by land, with intent to lay waste our territory and drive us from our homes, and has now a large mercenary army advancing to carry on against us a war of extermination.

It has, through its emissaries, incited the merciless savage, with tomahawk and scalping knife, to massacre the inhabitants of our defenseless frontiers.

It hath been, during the whole time of our connection with it, the contemptible sport and victim of successive military revolutions, and hath continually exhibited every characteristic of a weak, corrupt, and tyrannical government.

These and other grievances were patiently borne by the people of Texas until they reached that point at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue. We then took up arms in defense of the national constitution. We appealed to our Mexican brethren for assistance. Our appeal has been made in vain. Though months have elapsed, no sympathetic response has yet been heard from the interior. We are therefore forced to the melancholy conclusion that the Mexican people have acquiesced in the destruction of their liberty and the substitution therefor of a military government—that they are unfit to be free and incapable of self-government.

The necessity of self-preservation, therefore, now decrees our eternal political separation.

We, therefore, the delegates, with plenary powers, of the people of Texas, in solemn convention assembled, appealing to a candid world for the necessities of our condition, do hereby resolve and declare that our political connection with the Mexican nation has forever ended; and that the people of Texas do now constitute a free, sovereign and independent republic, and are fully invested with all the rights and attributes which properly belong to independent nations; and, conscious of the rectitude of our intentions, we fearlessly and confidently commit the issue to the decision of the Supreme Arbiter of the destinies of nations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on two subjects and to include statements which I made before the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief report of the operations of the Farm Security Administration for the past year in the Fifth Congressional District of Kansas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by our colleague the gentleman from Massachusets [Mr. MARTIN] at the annual beefsteak dinner of the Columbia Club at Indianapolis, Ind., on February 19, 1940.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to be made in Committee today by including therein an article by Herman G. Baity. It may slightly exceed two pages of the RECORD, but I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

THE PEOPLE MUST PUT AN END TO THIS SPENDTHRIFT ERA IN GOVERNMENT OR WE PERISH

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, every once in a while we read in the newspapers of how some spendthrift son or daughter has gone through an inheritance or fortune left to him or her by some benefactor who, as he slaved and saved, believed the recipient of the benefactions would use the gift conservatively and wisely.

Today, as I look at the Treasury Department statement for February 27, I am reminded of these spendthrifts.

So far this fiscal year our Government has gone $2,628,259,772 in the red. Unless we cut down this deficit spending by June 30 next, we will have run the year's deficit to over $4,000,000,000. Future historians will no doubt call this the spendthrift age in government.

But, Mr. Speaker, whatever the historians record, they will place the blame upon the Members of Congress who have been appropriating money for all kinds of schemes and projects faster than the expanding bureaus and agencies of the Government can spend it and almost twice as fast as the Congress and the Treasury Department can devise ways and means to collect the needed additional revenues to balance the Federal Budget.

So we have had to resort to borrowing; and our borrowing has been from the money changers—the national and international bankers, if you please, against whom Mr. Roosevelt so loudly declaimed in the campaign of 1932. May I now invite your attention to the fact that, instead of driving the money changers from the temple, they have built the money changers a new marble palace down on Constitution Avenue, where they sit in complacent glee and survey their doubly secure holdings.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, what a farce and sham the New Deal has made of our Government.

Oh, what debauchery has been committed in the name of democracy.

Oh, what a heavy burden has been placed upon the present and yet unborn generations of our people.

Shame upon you, spendthrifts. Shame upon you. The people must surely put an end to this spendthrift era this November or we perish.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a table showing the parity payments that have been made since the inception of the program.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and to insert an address of Robert C. Bassett delivered at La Crosse, Wis., on February 19, 1940.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from the Times Tribune of Minneapolis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a short letter from a farm leader in Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, something like a year ago I stood on this floor and talked about the cow. For the first time, I think, in the history of this Congress or any other Congress, there was revealed to many people, who believed that the only things produced in the United States were cotton, corn, wheat, and oats, the fact that there was a cow and she had four tubes and it took 17,600,000 pulls on those tubes in order to produce the milk.

Wisconsin cattle produced nearly 12,000,000,000 pounds of milk last year. This is about 11 percent of all the milk produced in the United States and it is an all-time high point in Wisconsin's milk production, according to the crop reporting service.

Estimates indicate that there were 2,108,000 head of producing cows on Wisconsin farms during 1939, which is a larger milk-cow population than shown for 1938. The average milk production per cow of 5,680 pounds was a little below the average for 1938, and the increase in the total milk production compared with 1938 came from the greater number of milk cows. The total milk production in the State last year was about 1 percent greater than in 1938.

With 11,973,000,000 pounds of milk produced on Wisconsin farms, the State continued its lead in milk production by a wide margin. Minnesota ranked second with 8,160,000,000 pounds and New York ranked third with 7,465,000,000 pounds.

Milk production for the Nation as a whole in 1939 was estimated at 108,558,000,000 pounds, which was somewhat above the production of 1938 when the number of milk cows was somewhat smaller. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief news story on the subject of stream pollution from the Des Moines Register.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two editorials.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an address given by our colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] at a Republican rally in Chicago on February 20.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a compilation of statistics concerning income-tax payers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a resolution from the Chamber of Commerce of Fall River, Mass., protesting against the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have requested this brief period to ask those who always stand ready to laud President Roosevelt and denounce the Republican Presidents before him what in the world Mr. Roosevelt would have done if those Republican Presidents had run the Government like he has run it?

Suppose the Republican administrations from 1920 to 1932 had used up all of the credit of the Nation for the past, present, and future, as has Mr. Roosevelt? Could he have become the Nation's spendingest President? Certainly not.

Summed up, Mr. Roosevelt and his followers are always blaming and finding fault with the very thing that made it possible for him to be a spending President. In my opinion, Mr. Roosevelt and his criticizing followers have continuously shown poor sportsmanship.

OCCUPATIONAL DISEASES

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill in relation to occupational diseases in this country, principally for the consideration and study of the present and the next Congress. I ask unanimous consent in this connection to submit a statement in respect thereto in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman speaks about occupational diseases. I think what we ought to do is to have a complete diagnosis of what has been happening in the last 7 years, due to the efforts of this administration, and if we do, then the gentleman will want to have an operation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KELLER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Simply to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania by saying that if he can look into and gage my mental processes he is a better man than I have ever suspected him of being. But I doubt his ability along that line as I do along so many others.

The purpose of this bill is to aid the States in the control of occupational diseases, that is, disabling conditions from exposures encountered in employment, by effecting better control of these hazards through maintaining special industrial hygiene units in State labor departments, these industrial hygiene divisions to function first by designing and applying engineering control measures to existing exposures; second, by aiding in the preparation of suitable rules and regulations for prevention and by directly aiding the enforcement agency charged with the application of the rules and regulations; third, by aiding the State adjudicating agency in the disposition of workmen's compensation claims.

Occupational diseases occur in all 48 States. Although the extent of damage to workers' health as a result of job hazards varies according to the nature and concentration of industry, this is definitely a Nation-wide problem.

No industrial employment is free from conditions capable of causing sickness, disability, and premature death. The industrial worker's life expectancy is 8 to 10 years less than the population at large.

Most seriously exposed are the estimated 5,000,000 workers menaced by specific, recurring, recognized occupational diseases, that is, lead poisoning, dermatitis, silicosis, asbestosis, poisoning from benzol, carbon disulphide, mercury, radium, carbon monoxide, and about 20 more.

Increasing use of new chemicals, new solvents, new processes are not only bringing new diseases but are producing an alarming increase in the known health disabilities.

Numerous surveys showing the extent of the hazard have been made. Half of the States recognize from 1 to 31 predominant occupational diseases in Workmen's Compensation Act schedules. Medical techniques have been developed to appraise and sometimes alleviate the damage, but preventive programs are wholly inadequate in some States and nonexistent in others. This is due primarily to insufficient funds available to the responsible enforcement agency, that is, the State labor departments.

While health departments in the several States have jurisdiction over the public health—contagious diseases, water supply, sewage disposal—this is a general authority, not specifically related to industry.

In virtually every State in the Union there has been set up by law a labor department or industrial commission charged with the duty of regulating working conditions and authorized to enter places of employment in the enforcement of labor laws, rules, and regulations. These agencies have specific authority and responsibility with respect to prevention of industrial accident and disease.

In three States—New York, Massachusetts, and Illinois—industrial hygiene units which deal exclusively with the science of protecting the worker's health have been integrated with State labor departments and operate wholly on State funds.

Under the Social Security Act of 1935 the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service has allotted Federal funds to 25 States and 3 city health departments for research in the field of industrial hygiene and sanitation. None of these industrial hygiene units in the health departments renders service to labor departments in any one of the following ways: First, actual enforcement of detailed rules or laws; second, adjudication of workmen's compensation claims; third, directly aiding in the formulation of administrative codes, rules, and regulations.

If industrial hygiene work is to serve a practical purpose other than the mere development of scientific information, it must be carried out by an agency integrated with the department of labor which has full responsibility for and jurisdiction over protecting the health of workers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

WATER-POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 685) to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 685, with Mr. O'NEAL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire the status of the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN] has consumed 29 minutes and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SEGER] has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, primarily for the information of those not in the Chamber yesterday, and who have not followed the developments of this pollution legislation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I rise to make a few remarks in the 5 minutes allotted to me. Speaking, first of all, as one of those who has been active in opposition to S. 685 up until yesterday and who has been urging Members of the House to recommit S. 685 for further consideration, I wish to explain why we have changed our attitude toward that bill. It has been the contention of the conservationists throughout the country, the Izaak Walton League, the American Audubon Society, and others, that it is better to have no legislation on pollution at all than to have legislation which does not make some direct improvement in the situation. However, I am happy to advise the House again that yesterday a compromise amendment was agreed to between certain members of the committee and those most interested in my pollution bill, H. R. 7971. At this conference we agreed on an amended version of the amendment which I was going to offer to the committee's bill, which is satisfactory both to the conservationists, and, I understand, to a vast majority of the Members of the House who are interested in passing an antipollution bill at this time. We anticipate the opposition of those who are interested in protecting the so-called vested rights of polluters and deny that polluters have any vested rights in American public waters.

We were opposed to S. 865 in its original form not so much because of what it did but because of what it left undone. This amendment provides that while we study the problems under the provisions of Senate bill 865 we shall invoke regulations preventing new sources of pollution.

It seems to me we have arrived at an honest, fair compromise whereby existing polluters will be given adequate time to correct their nefarious practices, and this Congress will have declared that it is opposed to the polluting practice and will have outlawed its future extension.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. DISNEY. Will your amendment have the same form as that appearing in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 1047?

Mr. MUNDT. My amendment is in this morning's RECORD. I am not sure on which page. It will not be in precisely the same form as it appeared in yesterday's RECORD, because after conference with committee members we altered it slightly, and you will find it in this morning's RECORD in the exact form and language in which I shall offer it.

I urge the Members to vote for this amendment so that both schools of thought with regard to pollution correction can unite in support of S. 865, because any legislation dealing with pollution is bound to have the opposition of certain industries, certain groups, certain manufacturers, who seem to feel that they have an inherent right to pollute the streams of America. Consequently those of us favoring progress toward clean streams must unite in this fight. My amendment rescues from H. R. 7971, which was the conservationists' bill, the bill which you were urged to vote for by various conservation organizations, the control features, insofar as they apply to nonexisting forms of pollution. This amendment prevents this Congress from taking the highly ludicrous standpoint of spending the taxpayers' money to correct a problem before we are willing to prevent the problem from growing worse so rapidly that it is fast becoming insolvable. If we are trying to correct it as it now exists, let us discontinue dumping new forms of sewage into the problem so that we will have to come back for additional taxpayers' funds to continue to study the problem which will be encouraged rather than discouraged by such innocuous legislation. It freezes the pollution problem where it is and says we shall proceed slowly, with Government assistance, in trying to find corrective methods for eliminating the present serious condition. In the meantime we shall stop putting new forms of pollution into the public waters of America. [Applause.]

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, of course, it is impossible in 5 minutes to discuss a question as broad as stream pollution. I have not read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] and would have to consider that before I could say whether I would accept it or not. However, for just a minute I do wish to bring to the attention of the Committee my knowledge of the efforts to secure pollution legislation.

I have been interested in that subject since I came to Congress. I think it was 20 or 21 years ago that I appeared for the first time before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in an effort to secure some relief from pollution. Almost every year since that time there has been the same experience. The trouble up to this time has been that legislation that was submitted was too drastic in character and friends of legislation to remedy stream pollution were driven away because they could not subscribe to the features of the legislation. The bill before the House approaches the problem in a sane, constructive way in an effort to try to find some solution. If a bill such as this had been passed by the Congress immediately after my first appearance before the committee about 20 or 21 years ago many of the hardships that we now undergo and much of the pollution occuring since would have been avoided. I hope the bill as reported by the committee will pass. If the Mundt amendment is offered, I must consider the legislation further.

I want to call attention to one other thing. In the draft of the bill which has been presented to the House this morning I find in section 2, subsection (c), a provision that compacts and agreements may be entered into between the States. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the last session of Congress my committee reported out a bill providing for compacts and agreements between States with respect to fishery matters, and that bill was vetoed by the President upon the sole ground that we did not provide that the compacts and agreements should be resubmitted to the Congress before actually becoming law. In other words, the bill that we passed did not meet the approval of the President because provision was omitted that such compacts should be referred back to the Congress for approval. I think the President was correct. We have reported again the same bill with language to take care of the omission. That bill has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate. The language we added to meet the objection of the President was:

> Any such compact or agreement shall not be binding or obligatory upon the signatory States unless it has been approved by the legislatures of such States and by the Congress of the United States.

The bill which was vetoed, omitted only the words "and by the Congress of the United States."

What I fear is that if serious consideration is not given to an amendment such as I have suggested now and will probably offer, we may be confronted with a Presidential veto if the President follows the precedent set by him in the last session of Congress.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I do not know what the attitude of the committee might be, but it seems to me that the gentleman's suggestion is a reasonable one. Rather than risk that veto, I think that an amendment such as the gentleman suggests ought to be presented to the House for approval. I cannot see any objection to it.

Mr. BLAND. If my time would permit, I would like to read this from the Presidential veto:

> This joint resolution is not in conformity with the usual and accepted methods of granting the consent of Congress to the execution of interstate compacts or agreements in that it lacks a provision requiring the approval by the Congress of such compact or agreement as may be entered into before it shall become effective. I believe that it would be unwise to establish the policy of granting in advance the consent of the Congress to interstate compacts or agreements in connection with subjects described only in broad outline as in Senate Joint Resolution 139.

The date of the veto was August 11, 1939, and the quotation above is the pertinent portion of the message.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL].

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and also of the Special Committee on Wildlife Conservation. I approach this problem, therefore, from two viewpoints. In my own district in the western part of Oregon we are very much interested, of course, in protecting our industries which use the waterways for the disposal of their waste. I recognize, as do you gentlemen, that we must in any program we adopt with reference to the prevention of further pollution or the eradication of existing pollution in our streams recognize the interests of the commerial users insofar as possible and at the same time preserve public health, fish, and wildlife. On the other hand, we should clearly adopt a program which will not only preserve those interests but will also protect an equally large interest, the right of the public, to have these great waterways of our country flow through their natural courses as little polluted as possible. We realize under existing conditions, with large cities bordering most of these streams and with great industrial enterprises, pulp mills, manufacturing concerns, and mines such as we have in the West, using the streams, that certain pollution is bound to take place. But it seems to those of us on the committee who have given this matter considerable consideration that we can reach a common ground where all interested parties and the public interest may be protected.

We in the West pride ourselves on our wonderfully fine waterways, lakes, and mountain streams. They constitute one of our chief assets in attracting to our communities tourists to enjoy themselves in fishing, outdoor sports, bathing, and otherwise using these fine waterways in which the West abounds. Not only are they useful and profitable for purposes of recreation, but also we want to attract great industries to use them. The Federal Government is spending large sums to develop many of them for transportation. Personally, I am convinced that the compromise, which now seems largely to have been arrived at by members of the committee on both sides of the aisle, is a step forward in the solution of this problem. It does not go far enough to suit some and too far for others. I favor the committee amendment, which will be offered when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule, and also the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. I wish to read the first sentence of the Mundt amendment. It is short. It appears in the Appendix of the RECORD at page 1097.

> After the date of the enactment of this act no new sources of pollution either of sewage or industrial waste shall be permitted to be discharged into the navigable waterways of the United States and streams tributary thereto until and unless approved by the division.

That division is the board set up within existing boards which we already have. It will not entail any additional expense, but will provide opportunity for men who are already charged with responsibility of protecting public health and industry to see that any attempt to pollute streams in the future may be stopped so far as possible. This is a beginning, at least.

Mr. Chairman, the matter of stream pollution has come to be one of the problems of major importance throughout the United States, and there is scarcely a community of any size bordering upon any of our waterways that has not been seriously affected by pollution. It is true that very material improvement has been made in some communities in meeting this problem; however, it is not a problem confined within a single State, but spreads across State lines by reason of its effect upon interstate waterways. Under the commerce clause of the Constitution the Federal Government is involved.

This bill, while it is considered by some as ineffective in meeting the situation, nevertheless is an advance and will give an opportunity to formulate plans and programs and financing through Federal cooperation with the States that gives promise of real effectiveness, eventually leading to a solution of the problem. Its most effective provision is the one regulating new pollution.

In Oregon, my own State, we realized the necessity of providing effective methods for reducing stream pollution and by a vote of the people have adopted measures which will eventually give our State real relief. All of the organizations in our community interested in wildlife conservation, such as the Izaak Walton League, have been active in a campaign to have enacted legislation along the line of the Mundt bill.

The committee amendment, whether amended by the Mundt amendment now pending or not, does not go as far as these organizations would prefer. Nevertheless, I feel we should be willing to accept the compromise by adopting the committee amendment with the Mundt amendment thereto.

I shall support that program, and urge all of you who are interested in taking a step forward in preventing further pollution of our streams to do likewise.

Mr. Chairman, in the House this morning, before we went into the Committee of the Whole, I secured permission to extend an article by Herman G. Baity on this subject, which I wish to follow my remarks at this point.

The matter referred to follows:

ASPECTS OF GOVERNMENTAL POLICY ON STREAM POLLUTION ABATEMENT

(By Herman G. Baity, Sc. D., F. A. P. H. A., professor of sanitary engineering, division of public health, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.)

(Read before the public health engineering section of the American Public Health Association at the sixty-eighth annual meeting in Pittsburgh, Pa., October 18, 1939)

All persons and agencies interested in the stream conservation problem are mutually agreed that there exists in this country a pollution situation that is most undesirable and uneconomic; that such conditions are so widespread as to constitute a major national concern; and that such remedial and preventive measures should be taken as to protect the public health, preserve public decency, conserve the wild-life resources, and promote the use of natural waters for wholesome recreational purposes. It is ironical and unfortunate that some of these agencies, whose interests and objectives are common, should differ so widely and fight so bitterly over ways and means of accomplishing desirable ends. The greatest contribution that can be made to the cause would be the encouragement of a dispassionate consideration of the opposing points of view and a reconciliation of differences. During the recent session of Congress there have been evidences that feelings are running so high as to develop bitter prejudices, cause misrepresentations of facts, and encourage the widespread release of misleading propaganda.

The proper legislative solution of this vexing problem, which requires the ultimate in vision and perspective, should take place in an atmosphere that is clear and calm.

Before considering the opposing points of view or attempting to weigh existing differences, it would be well, perhaps, to reflect briefly upon the fundamental uses of streams and the general nature of the pollution problem.

THE NECESSARY USES OF STREAMS

The uses to which streams and other natural bodies of water are put are many and various, serving in as many ways the needs of our individual and national life. Due to geographical and topographical conditions, the river basin becomes a kind of closed community so far as water uses are concerned. The stream becomes the source for domestic and industrial water supply, irrigation, and hydroelectric power developments; it serves the needs of recreational facilities; it provides the habitat for fish, shellfish, and water fowl; it furnishes the medium for water transportation; and provides the vehicle for the carrying away and ultimate disposal of the liquid wastes originating from our community life and industrial processes.

The use of a natural water course for the reception and disposal of liquid wastes is as necessary and legitimate as its use for any other purpose, subject to definite limitations. If such use renders the river unfit as the source of present or potential public water supplies, offends the senses, endangers health, inhibits the growth of wildlife, prevents its use for recreation, or obstructs navigation, the development of the drainage area will, as a result, be hindered or even stopped, and all people and properties within the area will suffer. But in emphasizing this danger one must not overlook the possible economic consequences which would result if overzealous demands for a pristine degree of stream cleanliness required a degree of sewage and waste treatment that would be prohibitory to municipal and private enterprise.

The proper balance of stream uses is different for every stream, and for each, depending upon conditions, there is one combination which is most logical and economical. Such a policy does not mean that our water courses need become or remain open sewers. In every case public decency and economy demand a degree of cleanliness sufficient to avoid nuisance conditions, provide recreational facilities, support useful aquatic life, protect the public health, and preserve the natural beauties of water. The solution of the problem lies in true conservation, which implies the maximum possible judicious uses of the many properties of streams, such uses to be evaluated from a consideration of the broad demands of the public welfare. It does not lie in any simple statutory device which attempts to regulate water quality upon the basis of a single water use.

POLLUTION ABATEMENT A PECULIAR PROBLEM

A complicating factor in dealing with stream pollution is the fact that the municipal or private agency making an outlay of money for pollution abatement is not the one which benefits directly from the expenditure. It is the downstream riparian owners and users of water who suffer from the pollution, or who reap the benefits of its abatement. In an age of exploitation of natural resources this peculiar fact has, quite understandably, caused both public and private polluters of water to dump their wastes in the easiest and least expensive manner, leaving the unpleasant consequences to the users of water on the streams below. In the past they have too often ignored the public interest and the welfare of succeeding generations and have shunned the responsibility of providing pollution relief.

But the days of pioneer exploitation and the advancing frontier are gone. The growth of densely populated and highly industrialized areas has tremendously increased liquid pollution, while the rainfall has remained practically constant, and normal stream flow has actually diminished under the influences of modern land use. The resulting condition is not limited in its effects to esthetics, recreation, or public health; the economic consequences are being felt. Many industries requiring water of high quality for modern processes of manufacture are already suffering great losses by reason of its defilement by their own wastes, or those of sister industries.

It is high time that serious cognizance be taken of the condition and value of the Nation's streams and plans laid for the sanitary redemption of some and for the continued protection of others, plans not only for the present but for the decades and centuries which are ahead.

EXTENT OF THE POLLUTION PROBLEM

The Third Report of the Special Advisory Committee on Water Pollution of the National Resources Committee, presented to Congress by President Roosevelt on February 15, 1939, contains the most accurate available data regarding the present status of the pollution problem. It estimates that 73,174,000 people of the United States were served by public sewerage systems as of August 1938, which represents 56 percent of the 129,818,000 estimated population of the country at that time.

This sewered population discharges daily approximately five and three-fourths billion gallons of liquid wastes, practically all of which finds its way, treated or untreated, into streams, lakes, and tidal estuaries. This enormous flow represents, however, less than one-half percent of the average daily flow of the streams of the country. The sewage from about 19,000,000 persons is subjected to primary treatment of sedimentation, while an additional 20,700,000 persons are tributary to secondary treatment plants. This total population of 39,700,000 served by some type of treatment works represents about 54 percent of the sewered population, or approximately 31 percent of the country's total population. In terms of volume, roughly two and one-half billion gallons of sewage are discharged daily in an untreated condition into water courses, while about three and one-fourth billion gallons per day receive treatment prior to discharge. However, it should be borne in mind that these statistics do not paint a true picture of the sewage pollution problem. The special advisory committee is careful to point out that it is not essential that all sewage receive complete treatment and that, under certain condition, no treatment may be necessary or desirable.

In the field of mining wastes, the committee estimates that annually about 2,700,000 tons of sulfuric acid entered streams as drainage from bituminous coal mines prior to the recent widespread campaign of sealing abandoned workings. From anthracite mining large quantities of culm and acid drainage also find their way into the water courses of this district. The oil fields are estimated to produce daily about 10,000,000 barrels of brine, a considerable part of which drains into streams. In some sections of the country hydraulic mining operations continue to contribute materially to the silting of stream channels.

A great variety and volume of liquid wastes are discharged from industrial plants into the streams of the country. No reliable estimates are available as to their amounts, or their specific characteristics and effects, but the committee rated them in descending order of importance as follows: Food products, paper and pulp, textiles, petroleum products, and metallurgical products. These wastes are harmful to the receiving streams in a number of ways. They may contain substances causing disease; they may impart obnoxious tastes, odors, and colors, which are revulsive to the senses, render the water unsuitable for industrial purposes, corrode structures, prevent recreational use of the stream, and inhibit the development of fish and other forms of wildlife.

COST OF POLLUTION ABATEMENT

The special committee estimates that the further cost of treatment works to bring about a reasonable abatement of water pollution would involve an expenditure of approximately $1,000,000,000 for municipal sewage treatment, about $52,000,000 for the control of coal-mine drainage, not less than $100,000,000 for the treatment of oil-field brine, and approximately $900,000,000 for the treatment of industrial wastes for which practicable processes have been developed. The annual operating and maintenance costs for the new sewage-treatment plants would amount to at least $15,000,000, while the fixed and operating charges for the treatment of mining, oil field, and industrial wastes would probably exceed $225,000,000 per year. These estimates of the committee for installation and operation assume that optimum use would be made of the natural purification capacities of streams and that, in many situations, much waste would be discharged untreated or with only minor treatment. The complete treatment of all wastes is estimated to cost several times more than the programs outlined above. Such a degree of treatment is considered unattainable, and, even though it were possible, a program of this extent is not considered necessary.

FEDERAL LEGISLATION

During the past 5 years various bills dealing with the problem of stream pollution have been introduced into Congress. These bills fall generally into two types, representing two opposing schools of thought with respect to regulation, and may be briefly summarized as follows:

The first measure dealing with pollution control was introduced into the Seventy-fourth Congress by Senator AUGUSTINE LONERGAN, of Connecticut. Largely supported by the wildlife-conservation group, the Lonergan bill provided for a central Federal regulatory agency to exercise pollution control through injunction procedures in the United States courts.

At about the same time other bills were introduced into the Senate and the House providing for Federal participation, through an existing agency, in a program of educational, research, and coordinating activities, but with regulatory control left to the States. These bills embodied the principles considered desirable by the health officials of the country, and were represented in the later Barkley-Vinson measures introduced in the Senate by Senator BARKLEY and in the House by Representative VINSON of Georgia.

Neither the Lonergan nor the Barkley-Vinson type of bill received final action during the Seventy-fourth Session, and both types reappeared during the Seventy-fifth Session. Late in this session the Vinson bill was passed by both Houses after the elimination of the drastic regulatory provisions attached to it by amendment in the Senate, and the United States Public Health Service was designated as the agency to represent the United States Government in the program. Quite surprisingly, the bill was given a pocket veto by the President on the basis of a technicality, although he voiced hearty approval of its basic objectives and principles.

The Seventy-sixth Congress saw the early introduction in the House of bills similar to the Vinson bill: H. R. 295 (PARSONS), H. R. 922 (SPENCE), and H. R. 2890 (BLAND). One similar to the Lonergan type, H. R. 4170, was introduced by Representative MUNDT. Later in February, Representative MANSFIELD, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, introduced H. R. 4314, the bill suggested by the Advisory Committee on Water Pollution of the National Resources Committee as incorporating the best opinion of Federal planning, budgetary, health, and conservation agencies, containing all the basic principles included in the original Vinson bill, and meeting the technical objections upon which the Presidential veto had been based.

Meantime, Senator BARKLEY had submitted S. 685, the same bill as the Vinson measure of the last session with some minor revisions to remedy partially the criticisms of the President, and Senator CLARK had introduced S. 1691, another measure similar to the Lonergan bill. The Barkley measure passed the Senate with minor amendments and went to the House, where it was reported favorably after being amended to conform to Federal budgetary procedure. This bill was given clearance in preference to H. R. 6723, a revised bill later introduced by Mr. MUNDT, but the adjournment of Congress left it in the category of unfinished business. It will doubtless come before the House for action at the next regular session.

CONFLICTING POINTS OF VIEW

In general, the organized wildlife conservation groups appear to believe that the only effective machinery for pollution control is a central Federal agency vested with broad and arbitrary powers to enforce abatement orders by mandamus procedures in the Federal courts. They select the United States War Department as best qualified to administer the program. They profess a lack of confidence in the ability of State and local governments to enact adequate and uniform laws for the abatement of pollution or to enforce such laws even though they were on the statute books. Furthermore, they charge Federal and State public health agencies with an unsympathetic attitude toward pollution abatement, disparage the achievements of these organizations in preventing and relieving pollution, discount the value and applicability of their research developments, and actually accuse these public agencies of bad faith in dealing collusively with offending industry.

On the other hand, all of the public-health agencies of the country, all Federal bureaus and departments concerned with water quality and use, such planning agencies as the National Resources Planning Board, and the President of the United States, apparently favor a type of legislation which gives to the United States Public Health Service certain functions and responsibilities pertaining to research, education, stimulation, and coordination, but leaves to the States, or authorized interstate agencies, the powers of regulation and control.

Those who have had most experience with problems of this nature subscribe to this latter policy as being most logical, reasonable, and, in the long run, most productive of satisfying results. Although the advocates of rigid Federal regulation may not be entirely without justification for their impatience with existing conditions and their cynicism with respect to the future effectiveness of State control, it is believed they may be laboring under certain illusions in their active legislative campaign.

Admitting the possibility that any commentator on so controversial a subject may have predilections that sway him from a course of strict neutrality, the writer ventures to examine a few of the points at issue between the two schools of thought:

Federal against State powers—the power delegated to Congress by the commerce clause of the Constitution is limited to commerce between the several States. Under this authority the Federal Government now exercises control over the discharge of refuse matters, other than liquid wastes, into navigable waters, and the Oil Pollution Act of 1924 rests upon this clause for its constitutionality. The same justification might apply to pollution of navigable streams by domestic or industrial wastes where such discharge constituted actual and appreciable hindrances to navigation, such, for example, as sludge banks in ship channels. However, isolated cases of this kind would not appear to authorize the taking over of the entire field of pollution control by a Federal agency. Since international treaties become the supreme law of the land, without question of constitutionality, the Congress has power to control pollution insofar as necessary to fulfill treaty obligations relating to boundary waters, regardless of whether such streams are navigable or intrastate in character. The Federal Government has the power to regulate pollution on the public domain and exercises some indirect control over water quality through the "beneficial public uses" clause of the Federal Power Act. Its domestic quarantine powers give it authority to approve the safety of water used for drinking and culinary purposes on interstate carriers, and, under voluntary agreements with the various States, it enforces regulations regarding the certification of interstate shipments of shellfish. Aside from these limited powers, in the opinion of leading authorities, there appears to be no constitutional authority for Federal water-pollution control.

The authority of the States over such intrastate matters as stream pollution is well established and cannot be taken away. State legislatures, by exercise of the police power, may enact statutes relating to pollution control or may delegate to agencies of the State the authority to formulate and enforce regulations pertaining thereto. However, the Federal Government does have the authority to conduct scientific and technical investigations relating to water pollution, to cooperate with the States in an advisory capacity, and to render financial assistance to State and local authorities for investigative and construction purposes. There is strong opinion that, regardless of legal powers, this indirect type of participation by Federal agencies would result in a more effective and orderly program of pollution abatement than could possibly be achieved by Federal domination.

Efficacy of centralized control: It is only natural that those observing the sad plight of prostituted streams should infer that the trouble lies in the inefficacy of control machinery under our system of Federal and State division of responsibility. There comes the urge to scrap the machinery and build on a different design. It appears doubtful that our State-Federal form of government is responsible in any large measure for the present situation. The pollution problem is old and world-wide, and for almost a century the countries of Europe have been wrestling with the legislative and administrative phases of pollution abatement. No nation has yet developed a workable plan for reconciling satisfactorily the various conflicting interests in natural waters to provide maximum judicious use for the greatest public benefit. It appears that the record in small highly federalized countries is no better than in those where the legislative and enforcement responsibilities are dispersed.

The explanation of the condition lies not so much in the deficiency or obsolescence of control machinery as in the extreme complexity of the problem, the multiplicity and conflict of interests, and the fact that pollution is only one phase of the larger problems of the conservation and maximum advantageous use of our water resources in general. A change in this condition will not result spontaneously from any device of centralizing power and responsibility. It may be expected to come gradually from the extension of powers on all levels of government, by fitting pollution control into its proper place in the broader control program of planned conservation and use of all water resources, by constant educational and promotional work of all interstate agencies, by relentless attacks along the whole front of the water problem by local governments under the guidance, stimulation, and participation of Federal groups, by the promulgation of interstate compacts and agreements, and by financial assistance from the Federal Government to public and private polluters requiring such aid.

Enforcement by mandate: To the provoked and impatient the correction of public evils by mandate has the appeal of being quick and effective. Regulation appears on the surface to be a simple device for curing all ills. Critics proclaim: "There ought to be a law." Perhaps it would be well to remember other times in our national life when similar evils have been observed, and when the laws designed to provide the perfect panacea proved to be unenforceable and disappointing. Moreover, those who have had occasion to invoke the police power of government in dealing with the public have long ago learned that the mailed fist is less productive than the velvet glove.

Public psychology reacts adversely to arbitrary force. Persuasion, education, and cooperation are more effective instruments than the "big stick," and the power of law should be held in reserve for exercise only when milder measures fail. The Lonergan, Clark, and Mundt types of legislation provide for actions in equity to be brought in the Federal courts and instruct United States attorneys to institute such actions when requested to do so by the Secretary of War or any one of the district boards. These bills appear to remove all existing authority of the States over sewage and waste treatment plants, and place their operation directly under the supervision of the chief of engineers, except for those waters ruled not to be navigable.

Although these bills carry provisions for cooperation with State agencies, for advisory services of other Federal agencies, for the collection and dissemination of information, and for Federal financial assistance, it is feared by many that the emphasis upon drastic control by court action would result in inadequate investigations of actual stream requirements and of the economy and applicability of treatment processes. Precipitate action without complete information would result not only in mental anguish but in the gross waste of public and private funds. Enforcement of the provisions of these measures with respect to new or additional pollution would tend to hinder industrial development and municipal growth, and might preclude the extension of sewers to presently unsewered and insanitary communities. In any case, such measures would be concerned with pollution alone and would neglect consideration of the many other related and inseparable problems of water conservation and use.

Pollution primarily a health problem: There can be no doubt that among the many objectionable and hazardous effects of water pollution the interests of the public health are paramount. Even the most ardent angler must recognize that in the general economy of a stream system the uses of water for such vital needs of life and health as public water supply and the ultimate disposal of domestic wastes are of supreme significance. And when the health interests in a stream are adequately safeguarded, there is usually the consequence that the quality standards of water for other uses are automatically met. It is therefore only reasonable and proper that the administrative responsibility for pollution control should be vested in Federal, State, and local health agencies.

In their criticism of the Barkley-Mansfield type of bill sponsors of the Mundt legislation disparage the splendid research accomplishments of the United States Public Health Service in this field and charge health agencies in general with indifference, inefficiency, and bad faith in dealing with water pollution. The charge has been made repeatedly that health organizations are in league with industrial polluters in conducting "study clubs" for the indefinite and wilfull delay of corrective measures. All who are acquainted with the records of the United States Public Health Service and State health departments will recognize such statements as false and libelous. There is probably no organization in the world that has excelled the record of the United States Public Health Service in the development of fundamental knowledge in the realm of stream pollution, water and sewage treatment during its 26 years of intensive and basic research on these subjects. The critics appear to be so unacquainted with the technical bases of pollution abatement as to fail even to recognize that the scientific problems are difficult, complex, and slow of solution. They remind the writer of an impatient textile executive who said that he could take a good chemist and solve all the waste-treatment problems in his industry in 30 minutes.

Army engineers or Public Health Service: Sponsors of the Mundt and Clark bills insist that Federal control be vested in the War Department in the interest of rigid enforcement, and cite many other reasons why the Army engineers should be placed in charge of the program. Without disparagement of the splendid record of the Corps of Engineers in their field of responsibility, it can be stated that not one of these reasons is valid. It is notable that there is missing from this list of reasons the primary one which should govern the selection of any Federal agency to perform a particular task, namely, the availability of personnel having the viewpoint, training, experience, background, and technical equipment to handle the problem. These resources for pollution control have been built up by the United States Public Health Service over a period of more than 25 years, during which time, with meager appropriations, they have assembled a highly qualified organization and established an enviable record of useful accomplishment. This work has been quiet, largely intangible, and removed from public view—a reason, perhaps, why the tangible and costly construction projects of the Corps of Engineers should give some people the idea that this agency is vastly superior in its ability to get things done.

As a matter of fact, in all stream investigations in which the Corps of Engineers and the United States Public Health Service have participated jointly the corps has requested the Health Service to handle all phases of the work pertaining to pollution, stream quality, and abatement recommendations. It is presumed that this has been done, because they feel that the Health Service is much better equipped to do the job. In any type of program the Army engineers would continue to handle matters relating to hydrology, maps, channel structures, channel configurations, etc., but it is certain that they would be the last to claim their superior qualifications to deal with the complex problems of pollution. It is apparent that the real reason for the opposition to the United States Public Health Service is the fact that this agency does not subscribe to the extreme views of a few groups interested in only one phase of the problem. Through more than 50 years' fruitful participation with States in regulatory measures for the improvement of the public health and welfare the United States Public Health Service has gained the full faith and confidence of the people of the Nation. It is logical and expedient that it should represent the Federal interests in any pollution-abatement program.

Progress in pollution abatement: Advocates of the plan of rigid federalized control by injunction maintain that the streams of the country are in such appalling condition as to constitute a threat to civilization, and are becoming progressively worse, as a result of the inherent impotency of any State system of regulation and the utter indifference and ineffectiveness of local enforcement agencies. In this connection it is enlightening to look at the record.

According to the report of the Special Committee on Water Pollution, more progress has been made in municipal pollution abatement during the past 6 years than in the preceding quarter of a century. Since 1932 the population tributary to treatment plants has increased from 21,500,000 to 39,760,000, a change from 35 to 54 percent of the sewered population of the country, or an increase from 17 to 31 percent of the Nation's total population. Within this period, and in the face of a rapidly increasing population and tremendous extension of sewer service, the sewered population not served by sewage-treatment plants has been reduced from 40,500,000 to 33,414,000. This has been accomplished at a cost approaching $1,000,000,000.

In the State of Ohio, for example, during the 12-year period 1928 to 1939, inclusive, 160 municipalities have constructed sewage-treatment improvements costing about $40,000,000 (exclusive of costs for collecting sewers, interceptors, etc.) serving 3,223,000 people, or nearly 50 percent of the State's population. In the State of New York, between 1933 and 1939, 102 municipal sewage-treatment works have been built at a cost of more than $38,000,000 and serving 2,854,000 persons. Together with the 161 plants installed in the preceding 30 years, these works now treat the sewage of 263 cities and towns, representing a population of 5,400,000 people, or 78 percent of the entire sewered population of the State. New York City's 10-year program for cleaning up the pollution of that area at a total cost of about $150,000,000 is proceeding on schedule, and several large plants have been placed in operation. The great abatement program of Chicago is essentially finished, and those of other large centers of population and industry are proceeding apace. Proportionate progress is being made in other regions of the country.

While an important impetus to this recent progress may be attributed to the availability of Federal grants-in-aid, most of the credit should probably go to the behind-scenes educational and promotional activities of public-health agencies which have been relentlessly carried on. And another important reason for progress lies in the realization by municipalities and industries of their moral and legal responsibilities in pollution abatement. While the progress made in the treatment of industrial wastes has not been so outstanding as that in the municipal field, many new plants have been constructed, and the general indifference of industry is noted to be rapidly disappearing.

The Federal-State pattern of cooperation: During a period of about 50 years, there has been developed a plan of action and cooperation between Federal and State authorities on all matters pertaining to the public health that has effected a closely linked relationship and results of most satisfying and significant values. In essence the plan involves the provision by the United States Public Health Service of (a) research services to develop scientific facts and procedures; (b) safe and uniform standards; (c) guidance in methods and procedures, by expert technical assistance; and (d) financial assistance; while the responsibility for legislation and administration of the programs is left with State health agencies. Notable among the achievements in the sanitary field of this working arrangement have been the improvement of drinking water quality, with consequent decrease of the intestinal diseases, through the application of the Treasury standard; the successful attack on the malaria menace of the South through the use of scientific facts, methods, and procedures developed by the Public Health Service; the unprecedented advance in safe milk production through the adoption of the United States Public Health Service standard milk ordinance; and the protection against infected shellfish by the application of standards pertaining to sources, production, and marketing.

In all of these activities and many others the United States Public Health Service has developed the scientific facts and shown the way; the States have accepted guidance and executed programs with enthusiasm and efficiency. There is every reason to believe that this plan is the best one that can be conceived for dealing with the problem of stream-pollution abatement.

CONCLUSIONS

The foregoing discussion indicates the author's belief in the following principles relating to the administration of a national program of pollution abatement:

1. That a stream must be recognized as supplying various important needs within the drainage basin, and that all these uses must be considered and balanced.

2. That one of the natural and inescapable uses of streams is for the reception and ultimate disposal of liquid wastes produced on their watersheds after such treatment as may be required.

3. That the self-purification capacities of streams must be utilized to a greater or less degree in all cases, alone or as an adjunct to treatment processes, and that complete treatment of all wastes is neither economically possible nor scientifically necessary.

4. That control of pollution by the injunction process, administered by a Federal agency, is of doubtful constitutionality, contrary to the principles of democratic government, wasteful of money, and ineffective in its prospect of satisfying results.

5. That regulation of pollution is a proper function of State government, and that a Federal agency should operate in an investigative, stimulative, and coordinating capacity, with financial aid furnished for administrative and construction purposes.

6. That the vexatious problems of pollution in interstate waters can best be solved by an extension of the system of interstate compacts and agreements.

7. That the most important factors in pollution abatement are those related to public health, and that health agencies should have the responsibility of administering the program.

8. That the United States Public Health Service is best qualified to represent the interests of the Federal Government, and that the pollution abatement program should be conducted in cooperation with State health agencies along the lines of the "Federal-State pattern" which has been found so effective in other similar undertakings.

9. That with a national campaign conducted under such a plan, and with reasonable availability of Federal funds for loans and grants-in-aid, the future progress in pollution abatement should be comparable with that of the past 6 years. At this rate, within a period of 5 to 10 years the more objectionable conditions of sewage and industrial waste pollution should be corrected.

I. STATUS OF WATER POLLUTION IN UNITED STATES, 1938

1. Municipal sewage:
Total population of United States	129,818,000
Urban population (incorporated places in excess of 2,500)	73,200,000
Served by public sewers	73,174,000
Percent of total population served by sewers	56
Population tributary to primary sewage-treatment plants	19,000,000
Population tributary to secondary sewage-treatment plants	20,700,000
Total population served by sewage-treatment works	39,700,000
Percent sewered population served by treatment works	54
Percent total population served by treatment works	31
Daily discharge of untreated sewage—gallons	2,500,000,000
Daily discharge of treated sewage—do	3,250,000,000

(NOTE.—These statistics cannot give accurate representation of pollution problem. It is not essential that all sewage receive complete treatment and, under certain conditions no treatment may be required. The reasonable self-purification capacities of streams should be utilized.)

2. Mining and industrial wastes:
Acid mine drainage from bituminous coal fields, tons H_2SO_4/year	2,700,000
Culm and acid drainage from anthracite coal fields	Unknown amount
Brine from oil fields, barrels per day	10,000,000
Debris and silt from hydraulic mining operations	Unknown amount
Industrial waste from manufacturing processes	Unknown amount

(NOTE.—Waste-producing industries account for about 75 percent of manufacturing activity of United States, with an annual value of production of $18,000,000,000 and with an employment of about 3,000,000 persons.)

II. ESTIMATED COST OF POLLUTION ABATEMENT

1. Municipal sewage:
Cost of additional sewage-treatment plants	$1,141,000,000
Annual operating costs of additional treatment plants	15,000,000

(NOTE.—These estimates based upon degree of treatment considered necessary and reasonable. If complete treatment were applied, additional capital cost would be about $2,000,000,000 and annual operating cost about $30,000,000.)

2. Mining and industrial wastes:
Cost of acid control at abandoned bituminous-coal mines	$12,000,000
Cost of corrective treatment at anthracite-coal mines	40,000,000
Cost of treatment plants for oil-field brines	100,000,000
Cost of industrial waste treatment works	900,000,000
Total capital costs	1,052,000,000
Annual costs of mining and industrial waste treatment	225,000,000

(NOTE.—These estimates do not contemplate complete treatment of all wastes, but assume optimum use of natural purification capacities of streams.)

3. Recapitulation:
Capital cost of necessary treatment works	$2,193,000,000
Annual operating and maintenance costs	240,000,000

III. PROGRESS IN POLLUTION ABATEMENT IN UNITED STATES

1910	34,700,000	3,900,000	11	4
1932	62,000,000	21,500,000	35	17

[1] Approximately.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time in support of this bill because in my district I have many of the largest paper mills in the world; in fact, I think, the largest—the Kimberly-Clark mills.

These people are very much in favor of this bill, S. 685, with the amendment that may be offered here today, which will have a tendency to do away with pollution. These manufacturers themselves have cooperated in the past to a large extent in efforts to eliminate stream pollution in what is known as the Fox River Valley. There are perhaps more mills along this river dumping pollution into the river than in any other place in the United States.

I want you to know today that the paper manufacturers of the United States, especially those in my district, would gladly cooperate and support this bill, as they have written me they want me to. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill for two reasons. In the first place, it sets up another commission in the Government of the United States that will cost several hundred thousand dollars per annum. In the second place, as was stated on the floor of the House today by those who favor this bill, the pollution question is being solved at the present time by the States.

I am a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and I have listened to every word of testimony that was given before that committee in reference to this problem. The testimony is to the effect that about 80 percent of the pollution problem has already been solved by the States, and each year they are working on it. Therefore this legislation is unnecessary.

Mr. COLMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. I understand that the gentleman is opposed to this legislation because it goes too far.

Mr. CARTER. I stated the two reasons I oppose this legislation.

Mr. COLMER. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he would not be in favor of any legislation on the subject.

Mr. CARTER. I believe the States are cleaning up the pollution problem and they should continue to clean it up. The gentleman from Mississippi is a very ardent advocate of State rights, and I do not want to send the Surgeon General of the United States down into the State of Mississippi or any other State to tell the people there what to do about their pollution problems. You have enough brains and ability in your own State to clean up this problem, and it is being done, and will continue to be done, throughout the United States.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SEGER. May I say that the State of New Jersey has spent $20,000,000 of its own money in cleaning up a river, and this money was spent without asking aid of the United States Government.

Mr. CARTER. I congratulate the State of New Jersey. In my own community we have a sewage-disposal problem that it is estimated will cost $15,000,000 to solve. I am sure if we could get this money out of the Federal Treasury my community would come running here in order to do that, but I am telling them to solve their own problem. There is no money in the Federal Treasury at the present time, and the only money we get in, little as it is, comes from the various States and municipalities. So they might as well finance their own problems.

Mr. BENDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. On the same basis the gentleman would advocate the abolition of the Bureau of Entomology, for which we appropriate $5,000,000 a year, and he would also advocate doing away with the appropriation for the control of the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. CARTER. One question at a time. I am using all of my ability to prevent you money spenders from establishing new commissions. I will enlist in any crusade with the gentleman from Ohio or others to eliminate a number of things that are not essential and necessary.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. In a few minutes.

Mr. CULKIN. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. I am well aware of that. I can remember as far back, may I say to the gentleman, as yesterday without his assistance. I decline to yield.

Mr. Chairman, we are in an unusual position here today. Technically we have before us the Senate bill 685, but the hope has been expressed by some that a substitute will be accepted in place of that bill. The substitute is an amendment that comes from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It is pretty much the same, although different in some particulars. In an endeavor to cut down the amount of overhead involved in this bill the Rivers and Harbors Committee set the sum at $250,000 per annum for the overhead expenses; but, Mr. Chairman, may I say that so far as the financial outlay is concerned, there is a joker in this bill, and I refer to paragraph (c), section 7, of the Rivers and Harbors print. In addition to the $250,000 that ostensibly is set up as the annual overhead, there is a provision in there which reads as follows:

The personnel of the Public Health Service paid from any appropriation not made pursuant to section 7—may be detailed to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act.

That is a section of this act—

That leaves it entirely up to the Surgeon General as to the number of personnel that will be transferred, and no one can stand up here and tell me what it is going to cost per annum to administer this act.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. May I ask the gentleman, whose memory is so good, does he know that these great rivers of the United States flow interstate? How is he going to get jurisdiction of them if they do flow interstate?

Mr. CARTER. I will be happy to answer that question. May I say first that we have rivers in the West that flow interstate. We have developed one of those rivers, the Colorado, and we did this through interstate compacts.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman means the Government developed it.

Mr. CARTER. I do not yield further. I desire to answer the gentleman's question.

I will vote here to permit these States to enter into compacts, if such legislation is necessary, and where there is an interstate river involved, if they desire to work it out on an interstate basis. I will permit them to do that.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. CARTER. I do not yield further. I think the example of the Colorado River compact is a splendid example for these other States and should be followed.

There is no necessity for establishing another bureau in the Government. While the annual overhead is set at $250,000 and upward for the first year, you gentlemen well know the history of bureaus and commissions. Let the camel get his nose under the tent, and it will rise up to a million dollars very soon.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the efficient and distinguished gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to my gracious colleague from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. There is a little joker further down in the bill—did the gentleman find it?—whereby the new division can call upon individuals from other departments to be assigned to duty in this work, and such persons must be paid from the appropriation of the department or agency from which they are assigned. Therefore the $250,000 is a mere trifle when considering the large number of engineers and scientists that will be assigned to work out this problem paid from other appropriations.

Mr. CARTER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. It is very apt at this time.

The President of the United States in an economy message delivered here a few months ago stated that the way to stop appropriations is to stop authorizations, and you Members of this House know that is the way to do it. If we do not stop these authorizations we are never going to be able to stop the appropriations. Therefore I am urging that this bill be defeated today.

I am for cleaning up the streams of the State and navigable waters and the inland bays and rivers just as much as anyone, but I maintain and contend, and I challenge anybody to prove otherwise, that this work is being done now by the States. Therefore, why set up another organization? If the Federal Government is going to do this at all, why not do it under the Chief of Engineers, who has a river and harbor organization at the present time covering the entire United States?

Mr. SANDAGER and Mr. BENDER rose.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. SANDAGER. I wish the gentleman from California would explain before he leaves the floor wherein the substitute differs from the original bill.

Mr. CARTER. The substitute differs in this respect: The original Senate bill provides for an overhead of $1,000,000 a year, with a limit of $50,000,000 for grants and lending purposes per annum.

Mr. COCHRAN. And awards or grants which mean gifts.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; for grants and loans. This bill provides ostensibly, on the face of it, $250,000 for overhead, but, as the distinguished and able gentleman from Missouri has suggested, it also leaves a loophole open whereby they can call in all kinds of personnel from the outside who will not be paid out of this appropriation of $250,000 per annum. Now, I ask, how much is this bill going to cost per annum? There is not a person in this House who can answer that question.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. I notice in the bill that this new set-up will be required to make tests of bathing beaches from time to time. Can the gentleman tell us how many bathing beaches there are in the United States? It would be interesting to know the burden on the division of this work alone.

Mr. CARTER. No; and that is another reason for voting against this measure.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I decline to yield further.

This division of water pollution is to be set up in the Public Health Service and is to be under the control of a director. The director is not appointed in the usual way by the President but, under the terms of this bill, is appointed by the Surgeon General, who has very extensive powers when it comes to administering this bill. From the study I have made of the bill, I believe their hope and their ambition is to set up another organization duplicating that of the Chief of Engineers throughout the country. They provide that this division of water pollution shall make its reports to the Commerce Committee of the Senate and to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House, as is done in river and harbor work.

Mr. Chairman, this bill should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Frankly, this bill calls for an expenditure of not more than $250,000 a year by the Federal Government. It provides that various political subdivisions and States may borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at a low rate of interest to prevent stream pollution. As I pointed out yesterday, we spend millions of dollars in order to exterminate various insects which infest the agricultural areas of the country. Insects recognize no State lines and neither does water pollution. This is the only satisfactory way in which this problem can be solved.

Our hearts bleed for Finland, and our hearts bleed for Czechoslovakia and Poland. We appropriate millions of dollars to be loaned through the Export-Import Bank for the benefit of these unfortunate people. But charity begins at home. Here is our chance to help our own people. Because of stream pollution thousands of lives are being affected and hundreds of lives are being snuffed out by reason of diseases resulting from pollution.

It is true that States and communities are doing much to solve this problem but there are many communities which have no funds. They would like to help out in this situation but they do not have the money. Let us give them the opportunity of borrowing this money from the Federal Government in the regular way. There are no grants in this bill. Nothing is given to them. The bill provides $250,000 to be used by the Surgeon General. The Surgeon General's Department has never been questioned on the floor of this House. A member of the staff of the Army engineers is to serve as a member of this commission and he will join hands with the Surgeon General in administering the law. [Applause.]

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, once more we have before us a so-called anti-stream-pollution bill. Those of us who have been interested in legislation of this kind for a great many years have been very hopeful, after the many years of work and labor which have gone toward a solution of this problem, that some day we would have before us a piece of legislation that we could get behind wholeheartedly and enthusiastically and support, because we believe that it may accomplish something to correct this evil which is one of our national disgraces. We have hoped we could have upon our books a piece of legislation that would be something more than a sop thrown to the people to make them believe that steps were really being taken to eradicate stream pollution in the United States, but here we have a bill very much like the other bills with which we have been confronted—a bill which gives unlimited bureaucratic possibilities; a bill which makes possible large appropriations from time to time to tell the American people exactly what we already know, and that is what is polluting our streams. Everyone in the United States knows what is polluting the streams. They know that stream pollution is coming from industrial and domestic wastes. They know that if stream pollution is to be prevented, the waste coming from the large industries and the sewage coming from the large metropolitan centers must be purified before it is allowed to go into the streams.

What we need is legislation which will clamp down on the influences which are polluting our streams and then prevent them, after a reasonable length of time, from allowing it to go into the streams. This legislation will not accomplish that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons we have never been able to accomplish anything definite in regard to the solution of this problem of stream pollution is the fact that those of us who are genuinely for legislation which will accomplish our purpose are usually kept divided by the efforts of those who pretend to be lobbying in favor of anti-stream-pollution legislation. It is quite plain to be seen there is many a lobbyist operating here in Washington who does not wish to accomplish the purpose for which he is lobbying. Whenever a lobbyist has a great issue and has behind him organizations that are financing him in his efforts, he is, of course, quite well aware that if he succeeds in having his issue enacted into law his position as a highly paid lobbyist is going to disappear. Unfortunately, because of the efforts of some of these lobbyists, those of us who are against legislation like S. 685 have been kept divided in order that we may not concentrate our efforts toward the enactment of a piece of legislation which will solve this problem.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this legislation will be defeated. I do not want a piece of legislation passed which will be heralded to the sportsmen of the United States as a panacea for the injustices they have had heaped upon them by the metropolitan centers and the industrial interests of the United States when, in reality, it does nothing whatever to solve the problem or to purify our streams and make them better centers for fishing, bathing, boating, and the water in them more healthful and palatable. [Applause.]

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know on what conservation meat the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], who preceded me, feeds. We have been confronted with the extreme attitude—you might say, the uncompromising attitude—of those who are interested in the conservation of game. All of them have acquiesced in this bill provided the Mundt amendment is added, and we have agreed to that.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. Just briefly; yes.

Mr. FADDIS. I simply want to say that I believe some of the interests who really do not want a bill passed have agitated the extreme views.

Mr. CULKIN. That is a statement, but the gentleman, obviously, does not want any bill at all, or he is blind to the progress of conciliation that has gone on here. Everybody is for this bill now, except the ardent and confirmed polluters who are threatening the life of the people of the United States.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. SEGER. I believe the gentleman is doing many of us here an injustice. I am not a polluter, but I am against the bill.

Mr. CULKIN. I was talking in terms of the public. I now want to say a word about the distinguished gentleman from California, for whom I have great affection. We are spending, for California and in California, approximately $400,000,000 to give them a good water supply. We are spending $150,000,000 on Boulder Dam, and we are spending $190,000,000 on Central Valley. This is to turn the ocean back, and turn salt water into fresh. Now, why in God's name, is the gentleman for that, and wholeheartedly for that, working ably in that cause, and yet resists the attempt of the people of the United States to cure this great problem of interstate pollution. The gentleman from California spoke about the engineers. The engineers are in fact, in this bill, but the engineers have no chemists, they have no groups that would analyze the bacterial content of these waters, and that is one reason why we put it in the Public Health Service.

Congress has worked on this problem for 20 years. This measure provides a progressive solution which will help a very difficult national situation. [Applause.]

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the House agrees with me today in extending our heartfelt wishes for the recovery of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD], who is in the Naval Hospital at the present time. Word has just reached the Chamber that he is to undergo an operation today, and we are all fervently praying that he will immediately recover and be back with us. If he were here he would be wholeheartedly supporting this measure, as he has so faithfully worked in the committee to get a bill reported that would fit the needs of the country and obtain the support of the membership of this House.

Mr. Chairman, this country is a country of propaganda. We talk about propaganda from across the seas in time of war, but I think we have more propaganda in America than in any other nation on the face of the globe, and the more the propaganda is spread for a common cause, sometimes the less we obtain results in the direction in which we are propagandizing. Recently, at least in the last 4 or 5 years, there has been a great wave of sentiment around the country to clean up the streams and harbors, and the more we talk about it the further some Members get away from it. Three groups are interested in this thing today. One is a small group, thank God, of the polluters who want to keep on polluting the streams. They are against anything that will clean up the situation. There is another group, not considering what has been done during the last 6 or 7 years, who would want to clean it up the day after tomorrow and have all the streams pure, with all of the fish swimming again. Then there is the larger group, I think, who believe in enacting legislation and attacking this problem in a sensible, logical way, whereby we will not have to destroy industry and the credit of the municipalities and the States of this country, but will eventually clean up the situation. I think it is the larger group that will support this measure today.

I was very much amused at the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER]. Two years ago he was against this measure because it provided $50,000,000 annually in grants and loans, but he never said anything about the $190,000,000 that the Government has been granting and lending to clean up the water supply of the State of California. He now comes in and complains, since we have eliminated that from the bill and reduced the administrative expense to $250,000 a year, that he is still against the bill because of administrative expenses.

Mr. CARTER rose.

Mr. PARSONS. I cannot yield; I have only a few minutes. The gentleman knows that if there was no added administrative expense for this Board in the Public Health Service that Service would have to neglect some of its other duties. I was responsible, perhaps as much as or more than any other member of the committee, in having the Chief of Engineers or some member designated by him to be a member of this Board, because the Army engineers have had jurisdiction of the rivers under the War Department for many, many years, and naturally, of course, they should be represented on this Board.

Let us see what has been done. In the 140 years prior to 1930 we had cleaned up the streams that had been polluted about 25 percent. In the last 7 years—and these figures are a matter of record—we have cleaned up pollution of the streams of this country at a rate which includes more than 18,200,000 population, which is, when we consider the pollution that comes from the cities, approximately 33⅓ percent. We have been making great progress in these last 6 or 7 years with the aid and assistance of loans and grants from the Federal Government. Prior to 1930 there had been about 3,900 plants erected by the cities and municipalities for the disposal of their sewage. In the last 6 years there has been erected 1,310 additional—more than 33⅓ percent in 6 years—over 140 years prior to that time. So I say that we are attempting in a big way to take care of the situation.

In answer to those who were followers of the original Mundt bill, where they wanted a drastic measure adopted, where they could enjoin muncipialities and private industry to immediately forthwith desist from polluting the streams, or to those who wanted a set definite limitation as to when those streams should be cleared, I say that we cannot afford to interfere with industry in such a drastic manner. We cannot afford to intimidate them and increase unemployment, and cannot afford to enjoin municipalities immediately whose credit is impaired somewhat at the present time. Therefore, after we have cleaned the situation 50 percent in the last 7 years to a point where industry has been cooperating in every case, and that without any legislation, but purely on a cooperative basis, I say to you who have been supporters of the Mundt bill that the amendment we have proposed to accept will gradually and surely eventually attain the result that even the most fiery solicitor for clean streams has ever wished for.

Now, it is estimated that it will take approximately $1,000,000,000 in the next 10 or 12 years for industry to clean pollution from the streams in the industrial areas. It will probably take another billion dollars in the next 7 or 8 years to effectuate for the municipalities the work that we hope to attain. We cannot do that all in a day or in a year. It takes a year or two to draw plans. It takes another year or two to get the contracts and the funds provided for, and then another year for the completion of them. The Public Health Service has said to us in committee that in the next 10 years, with the same progress that has been made in the past 7 years, we will practically have completed the program.

Now, as to new sources of stream pollution which the Mundt amendment covers, which has been accepted by the committee, it provides that no new source of pollution shall be poured into the streams or the tributaries unless approved by the Public Health Division. That means that if a new industry or a new city is established, they must come to the Board for approval before they can pollute the streams. Then if there are any individuals or if there are any municipalities who fail to comply, they can go into the district court in that area and obtain an injunction prohibiting them from polluting the stream. That is to take care of the situation so far as any of those who want this evil corrected now are concerned.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Do I get the idea that if it were clear to this board, they would permit pollution to enter into the streams?

Mr. PARSONS. Not at all; but they have a right to survey and investigate to ascertain whether or not the stream is being polluted, and we will not just have the say-so of some fellow who wants to crack down on industry at his own will, for political purposes or otherwise. That is why this protection is written into the Mundt amendment.

So I say that when the amendment is proposed by the committee, it should be adopted, and the amendment to the amendment which will be proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] should also be adopted, and that the bill be passed. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. This Mundt amendment which is to be offered, as I understand, is that which is printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 1097.

Mr. PARSONS. Of yesterday or the day before?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Of yesterday's RECORD.

Mr. PARSONS. That is correct.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. As I read it, if somebody wishes to start a reduction plant or a mill for the concentration of ore away up in the mountains of Colorado on a stream which is a tributary of the South Platte, which in turn is a tributary of the Missouri, which in turn is a tributary of the Mississippi, then he must get the permission of this Federal board before he can start operations, because, technically speaking, the discharging of a small amount of tailings into that stream would be pollution?

Mr. PARSONS. That is correct. If we ever intend to clean up this situation, there must be a beginning, and we thought it better to begin with new sources of stream pollution, because they could come under it as they develop, so that there would be no further expense to them in the operation of their business in the future.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. If I correctly interpret public sentiment in our State, the people of Colorado are more interested in encouraging private industry to give employment, in getting people back to work, than they are in having Congress enact any more of this so-called corrective or reform legislation. Every one of these bills puts more men on the public pay roll. Many of these bills discourage private investors in any plans to put more men to work on private industry's pay rolls.

Mr. PARSONS. Anticipating what the gentleman's next question will be, I will say to the gentleman that the Public Health Service has had such wonderful cooperation that they really did not want this language in the bill. They would rather proceed on a cooperative basis, because they have only had three or four cases in the entire United States where they have been turned down. But there are a number of Members here who believe that something should be put into the bill that the Public Health Service could enforce on new sources of stream pollution, if necessary.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the type of disturbance in a stream such as the gentleman speaks of is not in fact such pollution as comes within the scope of this bill?

Mr. PARSONS. As far as what the gentleman stated, it certainly would not come within the scope of this bill; but if it did, I am sure that the gentleman's State has a much stronger law against stream pollution than this bill itself carries.

Mr. CULKIN. The fact is that the great bulk of the stuff that comes from manufactures into streams is not, of its own nature, hostile to life or harmful to human beings. It does not come within the category.

Mr. PARSONS. Well, it would not come under this act at all unless it was shown that it was a source of pollution that created a nuisance to public life and marine life.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Nevertheless, an action can be brought in a Federal court there, and this man who wants to put a few or many men to work can be brought into the Federal court and compelled, at great expense, to go into the intricacies of how much pollution these few mill tailings would involve.

Mr. PARSONS. Not at all, unless it was a source of pollution. Tailings from a mine would not necessarily be a new source of stream pollution. It might be. Water coming from the mine might be.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The burden would be put upon the man who is planning to give others work to show in a Federal court that his proposed industry would not pollute the stream, unless he had been able to win in advance the approval of a Federal agency, probably wholly ignorant of such industry.

Mr. PARSONS. That is correct, but does the gentleman want to stop pollution in the future?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I certainly do.

Mr. PARSONS. If he does, then he should start now. If not, then he should not be for any bill at all.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I think we are handling that very well in our own State, as the gentleman stated in the beginning of his address. The people in our part of the country are getting very tired—they are, indeed, being rubbed raw—by Federal agencies and their agents and employees sent out there from Washington, some of whom have never before been west of the Alleghanies, who are wholly ignorant of our local conditions and who, under authority of Federal statutes, are trying to tell the people of Colorado how to run their State.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman knows that his State has a stronger law on pollution than this amendment carries here.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. It might not be so regarded by this new Federal agency.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I should like to have the RECORD show just what Congress means by the phrase "new pollution." In the great district which I have the honor to represent—however humbly—we have a great many canning factories. Their work is seasonal. Each year in the fall they pollute the water. Would this be new pollution since it happens only occasionally? Would that be considered old pollution? I wish the RECORD to show what the understanding of the committee is in order that the courts may so interpret the law when it is enacted.

Mr. PARSONS. I am very happy the gentlewoman has asked that question; and I may say that the gentlewoman represents here in the House the district represented by the man who served the longest number of years in the Congress of the United States, the late Joseph G. Cannon. Answering the gentlewoman's inquiry I may say that plants already in operation and which are now sources of pollution at certain seasons of the year would not be considered as new sources of pollution under the terms of the Mundt amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I have had a great deal of correspondence from wildlife preservationists, game protective associations, and like organizations in regard to this bill.

Mr. PARSONS. I have had a great deal myself.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. But in keeping with the remarks of the gentleman from Colorado let me say that the mining industry is very much concerned about this bill. I hope that the terms of the bill will be so defined as to prevent harm coming to, or unnecessary regulation of, the small mine operators such as the gentleman from Colorado mentioned. Unnecessary regulation must be avoided, even in this vital matter.

Mr. PARSONS. I think I can safely say to the gentleman that with the Public Health Service and the Chief of Engineers on this board he has nothing to fear that industry will be disturbed under the provision against new sources of pollution.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. SPENCE. Would the gentleman consider the enlargement of a present industry a source of new pollution, or an increase of the flow of pollutive substances from an established industry a source of new pollution?

Mr. PARSONS. This question has been raised by a number of Members. Answering the gentleman I would say that would not be a new source of pollution, because the present source of pollution is there. An extension or an expansion of a present business would not, under the terms of this act, be considered a new source of stream pollution. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the United States Public Health Service a Division of Water Pollution Control (hereinafter referred to as the Division). The Division shall be in charge of a Director, who shall be a commissioned engineer officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed for such duty by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service (hereinafter referred to as the Surgeon General). Such engineer officer, while serving as Director, shall have the rank of an Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, subject to the provisions of law applicable to Assistant Surgeons General in charge of administrative divisions in the District of Columbia of the Public Health Service.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. GAVAGAN: In S. 685, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby established in the United States Public Health Service a Division of Water Pollution Control (hereinafter referred to as the Division). The Division shall be in charge of a Director, who shall be a commissioned engineer officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed for such duty by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service (hereinafter referred to as the Surgeon General). Such engineer officer, while serving as Director, shall have the rank of an Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, subject to the provisions of law applicable to Assistant Surgeons General in charge of administrative divisions in the District of Columbia of the Public Health Service.

"SEC. 2. (a) The Division shall, after careful investigation, and in cooperation with the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, other Federal agencies, and the agencies of the several States authorized by law or duly designated to deal with water pollution, and in cooperation with the municipalities and industries involved, prepare comprehensive plans for eliminating or reducing the pollution and improving the sanitary condition of the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto. In the development of such comprehensive plans, due regard shall be given to the improvements which are necessary to conserve such waters and promote their use for public water supplies, propagation of fish and aquatic life, recreational purposes, agricultural, industrial, and other legitimate uses, and for this purpose the Division is authorized to make joint investigations with the aforesaid agencies of the Federal Government and any State or States of the condition of any waters of the United States, either navigable or otherwise, and of the discharges of any sewage, industrial wastes, or substance which may deleteriously affect such waters.

"(b) The Division shall encourage cooperative activities by the several States for the prevention and abatement of water pollution; encourage the enactment of uniform State laws relating to water pollution; encourage compacts between the several States for the prevention and abatement of water pollution; collect and disseminate information; make available to State agencies, municipalities, industries, and individuals the results of such surveys, studies, investigations, and experiments conducted by the Division and by other agencies, public and private; and furnish such assistance to State agencies as may be authorized by law.

"(c) The consent of the Congress is hereby given to two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts, not in conflict with any law of the United States, for cooperative effort and mutual assistance for the prevention and abatement of water pollution and the enforcement of their respective laws relating thereto, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts.

"SEC. 3. (a) The Division, upon request of any State health authority and subject to the approval of the Surgeon General, shall conduct investigations and make surveys of any specific problem of water pollution confronting any State, drainage-basin authority, community, or municipality with a view to effecting a solution of such problem, and shall make definite recommendations for the correction and elimination of the deleterious conditions found to exist.

"(b) The Division, upon the request of any municipality, shall make a periodic test of the water at any bathing beach within the limits of such municipality, and shall make a report to such municipality as promptly as possible with respect to the existence of water pollution at such bathing beach and shall make definite recommendations for the correction and elimination of any deleterious conditions which are found to exist: Provided, That only such sums as may be specifically appropriated for such purposes shall be expended in making such tests and recommendations.

"SEC. 4. The Public Health Service shall prepare and publish, from time to time, reports of such surveys, studies, investigations, and experiments as shall be made under the authority of this act, together with appropriate recommendations with regard to the control of pollution of the waters of the United States.

"SEC. 5. Every loan or purchase of securities by Reconstruction Finance Corporation to finance the construction of treatment works shall hereafter be made only upon the recommendation of the State health authority having jurisdiction and upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General and his certification that such construction is necessary to prevent the discharge of untreated or inadequately treated sewage or other waste which would substantially impair the quality of any waters of the United States.

"SEC. 6. (a) There is hereby established in the Division, by detail from time to time, a board of five, four of whom shall be commissioned engineer officers of the Public Health Service, a majority of whom shall be experienced in sanitary engineering, and the fifth, the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, or a member of the Corps of Engineers designated by him, all said members to serve without additional compensation. The duties of said board shall be fixed by the Surgeon General, and to it shall be referred for consideration and recommendations, in addition to any other duties assigned, so far as in the opinion of the Surgeon General may be necessary, all reports of examinations, investigations, plans, studies, and surveys made pursuant to the provisions of this act or hereafter provided for by the Congress, and all applications for loans for the construction of necessary treatment works proposed to be made pursuant to section 5 of this act, and all other matters in connection therewith upon which report is desired by the Surgeon General. The board shall submit to the Surgeon General recommendations as to the desirability of commencing, continuing, or extending any and all projects for treatment works upon which reports are desired and for which loan applications have been made. In the consideration of such proposed treatment works and projects the board shall have in view the benefits to be derived by the construction thereof in accomplishing the purpose of this act, and the relation of the ultimate cost of such works, both as to the cost of construction and maintenance, to the public interests involved, the public necessity for such works, and the adequacy of the provisions made or agreed upon by the applicant for the loan for assuring proper and efficient operation and maintenance of the works after completion of the construction thereof. The board shall, when it considers the same necessary, and with the approval and under orders from the Surgeon General, make as a board or through its members, personal examinations of localities where the proposed treatment works are to be located. All plants, cost estimates, information, and arguments which are presented to the board for its consideration in connection with any matter referred to it by the Surgeon General shall be reduced to and submitted in writing, and shall be made a part of the records of the office of the Surgeon General.

"(b) As soon as practicable the board shall classify the navigable waters of the continental United States into districts to be known as sanitary water districts. The board shall fix and define the boundaries of each such district and may from time to time alter such boundaries. The areas of such districts shall, insofar as practicable, conform to the areas of watersheds not wholly contained within the boundaries of one State.

"(c) All special reports ordered by the Congress pursuant to the provisions of this act shall, at the discretion of the Surgeon General, be reviewed in like manner by the said board; and the said board shall also, on request by resolution of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives submitted to the Surgeon General, examine and review the report of any examination, investigation, survey, or project for the elimination or reduction of water pollution or for the construction of treatment works made pursuant to any act or resolution of the Congress, and shall report through the Surgeon General, who shall submit its conclusions thereon through the Federal Security Administrator and the President as in other cases.

"SEC. 7. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, the sum of $250,000 for all necessary expenses of the Division in administering the provisions of this act, including (a) expenses of investigations made under this act, including (1) printing and binding of the findings of such investigations; (2) the pay and allowances, travel expenses of personnel of the Public Health Service (including commissioned officers) while engaged in field investigation; (3) (upon the approval of the Surgeon General) the expenses of packing, crating, drayage, and transportation of the personal effects of such personnel and personnel of other Government departments on duty with the Public Health Service upon permanent change of station under competent orders in connection therewith while engaged in such investigations; and (4) purchases required for such investigations, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 41, sec. 5), when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $100; (b) upon approval of the Surgeon General, the necessary expenses of the board of engineer officers provided for in section 6 (a) of this act; (c) the pay and allowances and travel expenses of Reserve engineer officers while on active duty under section 8 (a) of this act; and (d) for the reimbursement of appropriations insofar as expended for pay and allowances of personnel detailed to the Division under section 8 (c) or 8 (d) of this act.

"SEC. 8. (a) For the administration of this act, the Federal Security Administrator may, upon recommendation of the Surgeon General, appoint such engineers, attorneys, experts, research assistants, examiners, and consultants as may be necessary, and fix their compensation, in the manner provided by law for the appointment and fixing of compensation of personnel of the Public Health Service; and the Surgeon General is authorized to transfer, assign, or detail to the Division, from any other division of the Public Health Service, such professional and scientific personnel as may be available. Not exceeding 10 engineer officers in the Reserve of the Public Health Service may be ordered to active duty for such periods of time as may be desirable, extending not more than 5 years beyond the date of enactment of this act, to assist in carrying out the purpose thereof.

"(b) Such clerks, stenographers, and other employees as may be necessary to discharge the duties of the Division and for the investigations in the field shall be appointed by the Federal Security Administrator in accordance with the civil service laws and their compensation shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and he shall prescribe such rules and regulations with respect to their duties as he may find necessary.

"(c) The personnel of the Public Health Service paid from any appropriation not made pursuant to section 7 may be detailed to assist in carrying out the purpose of this act.

"(d) The Federal Security Administrator, with the consent of the head of any other executive department of the Federal Government, may utilize such officers and employees of said department as may be found necessary to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 9. When used in this act, the term 'State health authority' means the official State health department, State board of health, or such other official State or interstate agency as is empowered with the duties of enforcing State laws pertaining to public health or to the abatement of pollution of waters; the term 'treatment works' means the various devices used in the treatment of sewage or industrial waste of a liquid nature, including the necessary intercepting sewers, outfall sewers, pumping and power equipment and their appurtenances; the term 'person' means an individual in the capacity of proprietor of an industrial enterprise, a partnership, a private corporation, an association, a joint-stock company, a trust, or an estate.

"SEC. 10. No provision of this act shall be construed as superseding or limiting the functions, under any other act, of the Public Health Service relating to the prevention, control, and investigation of sewage and pollution either directly or indirectly of the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto.

"SEC. 11. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 12. All provisions of this act applicable to the States shall also be applicable to the District of Columbia and the Territories, including Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 13. This act may be cited as the 'Water Pollution Act.'"

Mr. GAVAGAN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment may be dispensed with as it was printed in the RECORD of yesterday.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I ask if this amendment now submitted to the House includes the so-called Mundt amendment?

Mr. GAVAGAN. No; it does not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN] is recognized for 5 minutes in support of the amendment.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Is the amendment the gentleman is now offering included in the print of the bill headed "Confidential Committee Print"?

Mr. GAVAGAN. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLER. Is the bill to be read by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the bill has been considered as read, it now being in the form of a committee amendment.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. As I understand the situation, the bill as read is one amendment which is pending before the Committee, and that now amendments may be offered to any portion of that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's understanding is correct.

Mr. BLAND. That an amendment may be offered, but an amendment to an amendment could not be offered because it would be an amendment in the third degree.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the only difference between the amendment as now offered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the bill as it passed the Senate is that sections 5 and 6 of the Senate bill are stricken out. These sections provided for Federal aid to States and for Federal grants and loans to persons, individuals, and corporations. A further change is made that instead of the lending authority being the Secretary of the Treasury it has been changed to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Otherwise, with a few changes in prepositions throughout the bill, there has been no other change from Senate bill 685.

Mr. KELLER. May I ask what is the idea of striking out the Senate provision, which seemed to me to be a very good one, having to do with granting aids to cities and States? There are many cities in the United States at the present time that are entirely unable economically to undertake this very thing of doing away with stream pollution.

Mr. GAVAGAN. The reason for it is the state of the Treasury of the United States and the exorbitant cost that would be involved in rectifying the situation through Government grants-in-aid or loans. The loans will have to be justified before the R. F. C. They will have to be able to show that the work is not only necessary but that there will be a chance for the Government to get back its money.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. The fact is that the President vetoed the original bill passed 2 years ago because it did not conform to budgetary requirements. We have been trying to correct that situation.

Mr. KELLER. Which means what?

Mr. PARSONS. That means he does not want any more outright grants given to municipalities.

Mr. KELLER. What are you going to do in the case of a town that is practically bankrupt?

Mr. PARSONS. The attorney for the R. F. C. stated before the committee that where municipalities or private business could not obtain local bank loans for this purpose, they could come to the R. F. C., make application there, and get relief under the terms of this act.

Mr. KELLER. Do I understand that goes far enough to meet a condition like this: There is a city of considerable thousands of people in my district which is in default at the present time on its water and sewage bonds. Those sewage bonds did not provide for sewage disposal at all. I do not know how they could go about it. You will find 50 or 100 situations in the United States that ought to be attended to, and the people desire not to pollute the streams, but they will be prevented from carrying out the idea expressed in this act unless they have assistance.

Mr. PARSONS. Of course, we cannot legislate for each particular case in a measure of this kind. The loan feature is in here in order to give them that opportunity.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEGER. I think we would be interested in this dialogue if we could hear more of it.

Mr. SPENCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I think the reason that grants were taken out of the bill was because of a suggestion made by the President, who said this would further unbalance the Budget. He disapproved of the grants and vetoed the other bill. We certainly do not want to pass a bill that will be vetoed again. He expressly said he did not want grants in the bill because it would be a direct obligation against the Government.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the so-called Rivers and Harbors Committee amendment is now pending before the House as an amendment to the original bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and it is subject to amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER to the Committee substitute amendment: Page 9, line 15, strike out lines 15, 16, and 17.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman tell us the language that is stricken?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, the part which will be stricken by my amendment reads as follows:

The personnel of the Public Health Service paid from any appropriation not made pursuant to section 7 may be detailed to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN], which is really a substitute for the original Senate bill, has never been referred to the Bureau of the Budget. So far as I know it has never been referred to anybody. So far as I know, and I am a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, no witness was ever called before that committee to testify in reference to this bill.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Not at this point. No hearings were ever held. I was unable to attend all of the meetings, but I understand there was some discussion among the committee membership about the bill at the time of reporting it; but other than that, so far as I know, there was not one witness called.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman knows there was a conference held at the other end of the Avenue, attended by all parties interested and all of the Government agencies interested or named in this bill, and all agencies that will have anything to do with the functioning or the administration of it. This was all thrashed out, and this appropriation of $250,000 was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman flatters me. This is the first time I ever heard of that conference. I never knew of such a conference; and if there were any Republicans present, I was not one of them. I knew absolutely nothing about the meeting.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman missed three meetings of the Rivers and Harbors Committee at which this amendment was discussed rather at length.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, I have no doubt but that the committee discussed it. What I am saying is that no hearings were ever held on this bill.

Mr. CULKIN. We heard the R. F. C. attorneys on it, and we heard Dr. Parran on it in detail.

Mr. CARTER. Did the gentleman from New York attend the meeting at the other end of the Avenue referred to by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CULKIN. I did not.

Mr. CARTER. Was the gentleman aware of the meeting?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; I knew about the meeting.

Mr. CARTER. Well, the gentleman had more information than I.

Mr. CULKIN. Why was not the gentleman present at the three meetings of the Rivers and Harbors Committee when this amendment was brought up? Was he busy otherwise? I assume he was.

Mr. CARTER. I am not answerable to the gentleman from New York for my actions. I believe upon reflection the gentleman from New York will want to withdraw that question. I am answerable to my constituents and to my conscience as to my presence. I decline to yield further.

If the gentleman wants to proceed in an unparliamentary manner that is his business.

Mr. CULKIN. I am complimenting the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. I decline to yield further, but I want to say that I most thoroughly resent the question of the gentleman from New York. I feel amply able to determine where I shall be at any particular time without any suggestions from him.

The amendment I have offered strikes from the bill that section which would permit the Surgeon General to call into this work any number of employees from other parts of the Public Health Service not paid out of the $250,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER. It is the only way we are going to know what this overhead will amount to. As it is at the present time, I understand they have technical experts there whom they pay $50 a day. There is no limit to the number of those experts that might be called in. They are not paid out of this appropriation of $250,000.

Let me say that it would be a most reckless act on the part of this Committee to delegate to the Surgeon General this authority. As I called to the attention of the Committee a few minutes ago, the President of the United States does not appoint this director, it is the Surgeon General who appoints the director of this division, and he is responsible to the Surgeon General alone.

I do not want to be misunderstood in reference to this matter. I am opposed to this bill and I am opposed to the substitute that was offered by the gentleman from New York. I want to say, however, that my amendment does make that substitute a much better bill than it is at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry our colleagues in the committee have gotten into a personal and acrimonious discussion. Much as I admire the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER], and he is an esteemed and good friend of many years, I cannot really believe he is sincere in his amendment to strike out subdivision (c) of subdivision (a) of this paragraph. The paragraph, as written by the committee, simply gives the Surgeon General the right to transfer employees already upon his pay roll from one division or another to this new division. There is nothing strange about that procedure. We have been doing it from time immemorial.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the amendment will not be agreed to. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MUNDT to the committee substitute to S. 685: Immediately after subsection "c" of section 2 of the committee amendment, add the following subsection:

"(d) (1) After date of enactment of this act, no new sources of pollution, either by sewage or industrial waste, shall be permitted to be discharged into the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto until and unless approved by the Division; and

"(2) The discharge of new sources of water pollution without review and approval of the Division as required under the foregoing provisions is hereby declared to be against the public policy of the United States and to be a public and common nuisance. An action to prevent or abate any such nuisance may be brought in the name of the United States by any United States attorney, and it shall be the duty of such attorney to bring such an action when requested to do so by the Division, the Surgeon General, any duly constituted interstate agency dealing with control of water pollution, any State agency dealing with control of water pollution, any State health authority, or any incorporated municipality. Such action shall be brought as an action in equity and may be brought in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear and determine equity cases."

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is acceptable to the committee.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is opposed by members of this committee, and I ask to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, as you know, I have discussed this amendment and it has been discussed by members of the committee and by different conservationists on the floor for the last 2 days. I do not believe it is necessary to go into detail as to what it does. Substantially, it simply states that if Congress is ready—and I am sure it is—to do something about pollution, to go along with S. 685 and appropriate a small amount of money to help encourage surveys and studies of the pollution problem, to make available to municipalities and to industries at low interest rates money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to establish pollution-control works, to declare that pollution is not in accord with the better public policy of America, and still withal to assume a reasonable attitude that we are not going to clamp down this year or next year and stop polluters from continuing a practice in which they have for many years been engaged, my amendment follows almost axiomatically as an important and integral part of that philosophy.

Surely before we begin the appropriation of money from the Federal Treasury to attack the problem of pollution we must do something to stop new forms of deleterious pollution injurious to human life and detrimental to animal and fish life, and that is all my amendment does.

The question confronting us, then, is that with S. 685 and this amendment added to it, the conservationists of the country are united in saying that we are making some progress toward pollution regulation and elimination. Without my amendment and with no pollution-discouraging legislation it resolves itself into whether or not we are going to bring before this country some day a dwarfed and distorted version of the great Abraham Lincoln, raised on the shores of some flowing sewer, who will say: "Let us make this Government a government of the polluters, by the polluters, and for the polluters."

The issue is clear-cut. The committee has indicated its acceptance of my amendment—at least those members of the committee who are supporting S. 685 have done so—and I hope it will have the approval of this body. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, for years I have been following this legislation and have seen it inevitably wrecked upon this rock.

Let me read this amendment and then let us see whether the men here will vote for it or not:

(d) (1) After date of enactment of this act, no new sources of pollution—

If a man residing in a town wants to build his own garage that happens to dump waste into the sewer that goes into navigable water, without any previous permission for that event, he is in danger of Federal prosecution.

No new sources of pollution, either by sewage or industrial waste—

The man who lives on the outskirts of a city and under the Constitution of the United States, as declared in decisions of the Supreme Court, has been dumping his sewage into such waters and decides tomorrow to build a house, with similar provision for his sewage, if this law is passed, is in danger of apprehension by the Federal courts and to trial before a Federal jury—shall be permitted to be discharged into the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto until and unless approved by the Division; and—

Take the man who has a hogpen, such as one of my friends mentioned to me a few moments ago, should let some of the wash go into the water, what has he facing him? Let us see:

The discharge of new sources of water pollution without review and approval of the Division as required under the foregoing provisions is hereby declared to be against the public policy of the United States and to be a public and common nuisance. An action to prevent or abate any such nuisance—

The man who is building a house with the sewage that runs down into navigable water, or the man who is building a garage with a new source that goes down to the navigable water—may be brought in the name of the United States by any United States attorney, and it shall be the duty of such attorney to bring such an action when requested to do so by the Division, the Surgeon General, any duly constituted interstate agency dealing with control of water pollution, any State agency dealing with control of water pollution, any State health authority, or any incorporated municipality. Such action shall be brought as an action in equity and may be brought in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear and determine equity cases.

Hitlerism run mad! Any attempt to impose such conditions as this upon the people of the country, without even a month to prepare for such a situation, would immediately drive municipalities and cities into bankruptcy or at least impede their growth.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman understand the amendment to mean that if I want to build a new house in my town and attach it to the existing sewers I would be prohibited from doing so?

Mr. BLAND. I cannot read anything else, and if it does not mean that, in the name of heaven let them say so, and not bring you up before a Federal court to be tried and then have it decided that it does not mean that.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, an apartment house or the home of a man in the city would drain into the city sewer?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. And in that event the municipality does the dumping and not the builder or the owner of the house. The act would be but a continuation of existing conditions. Therefore the part of the bill referred to by the gentleman would make it impossible to bring the man whom the gentleman from Kentucky refers to within the scope of the bill.

Mr. MAY. He is subject to prosecution under the act.

Mr. BLAND. He could be brought to prosecution.

Mr. MICHENER. There would be no such prosecution, as this is an equity proceeding.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is the most far-reaching amendment that was ever submitted to a legislative body affecting the people of the United States. If that instrument, formerly known as the Constitution of the United States, is still in existence, I have very serious doubts of its constitutionality. I once investigated the law under which these actions may be brought as to whether the Constitution of the United States would probably protect these people. I think it would, but I am not going to take the chance of having my constituents brought into a Federal court and then have to appeal their cases and become bankrupt.

Mr. Chairman, our country and our Congress would be brought into disrepute by the adoption of such an amendment.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. In our section of the State we have drainage ditches that flow into navigable streams and in some counties they are a mile apart. Would we have to come to Washington or to some agency in Washington to get a permit to have these drainage ditches flow into some of these navigable streams?

Mr. BLAND. In my opinion, yes; and every fellow, as my friend said a while ago, who built a pigpen, if some of the drainage was going into navigable water—and you can see how far that reaches—would have to come to Washington and say, "Please let me build my pigpen there." It is ridiculous. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I may say to the gentleman that in my district there are, perhaps, 1,000 drainage ditches and they would have to have 1,000 hearings.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If this amendment had been offered by some rabid new dealer, I might be able to understand it, but it is astonishing to me to find a member of the Republican Party proposing to establish here bureaucratic control over the lives and operations of the people and the business of this country, without definitions or standards, and without giving any opportunity for hearing or consideration of the facts involved on the part of anybody. Talk about bureaucratic government. Here is proposed an amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] to give a division in the Public Health Service the right of life and death over the operations of business and home life throughout this Nation. No new paper factory in my part of the country, for instance, could be established without the consent of the Public Health Service. No pigpen, as somebody has suggested, could be put where it might discharge some waste into a branch which runs into a navigable stream, without the consent of the Public Health Service, and yet you provide absolutely no definition of what waste is; no definition of what pollution is; and no place where a person can get a hearing and find out what his rights are under this amendment. It is the most far-reaching thing I have ever seen proposed in the way of bureaucracy.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. MAY. It goes even further than the proposal the other day against which gentlemen on the other side of the House voted almost unanimously in connection with the census bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Certainly. If you are talking about delegation of authority, and we heard a good deal about it in reference to trade agreements, this delegates all the authority in the world to a division of the Public Health Service. You could not do anything in the way of erecting a factory or a home that discharged any waste into a branch that ran into a river that is navigable without the authority and consent of the Public Health Service.

Mr. MOTT. Would the gentleman's objection be removed if this language in subdivision (d) of the amendment "until and unless approved by the division" were removed? Would that remove the objection, simply making it mandatory law that no new pollution source should be emptied into navigable streams, and fixing a penalty for violation of that law?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think that would change the effect of it at all, because you are making it the public policy of the United States and giving the courts the right to enjoin a man from operating, and you have given no definition here or any language which tells a man what he can or cannot do. There is nothing in the bill that defines what is pollution or waste.

Mr. MOTT. If pollution were properly defined and the law were made mandatory prohibiting the doing of certain things and not leaving anything to the discretion of the division, would that remove the gentleman's objection?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I cannot pass on something until I see it in language. I am objecting to giving an agency of the Government absolute authority without any possibility of a hearing, without his having his day in court, until he is dragged into court in the face of an injunction which might destroy the property that cost him thousands of dollars to build.

Mr. MOTT. Then the gentleman's objection is that this law places discretion in the hands of a division and makes violation of a regulation of the division a violation of law instead of the law being a mandatory one?

Mr. RAMSPECK. My objection is simply this: If we are going to prohibit industrial waste and pollution from going into streams, then that ought to be defined and there ought to be a procedure where a man can get a hearing and have his day in court, and a right to appeal from a decision of this agency, just as we set up in the Federal Trade Commission and other agencies of that type. If we had some such procedure as that, I think I would be able to go along. I am in favor of cleaning up the streams, and I am in favor of this bill as reported by the committee, without this amendment, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It seems to me that this matter of stream pollution which has been before this body for the last 22 years, and upon which some 16 or 18 hearings have been held, has been thoroughly discussed time and time again, and when those of us who are interested in sportsmen's organizations and the wild and fish life of the country come here in an effort to make even a small start, we have the Constitution and all of the hobgoblins in the world to contend with simply because we are making a start to clean up a situation which we all know is every day getting a little bit worse.

My able and distinguished friend from Virginia, the chairman of the great Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, than whom there is no more sincere or conscientious member, has conjured up the ugly picture of dictatorship, the exceedingly distasteful thought of Hitlerism, and has shed some crocodile tears for the little garage and even the small-home owner. He would have you believe that by the adoption of the Mundt amendment we are creating another governmental Frankenstein which we shall not be able to control.

Nothing is farther from the truth, and I am sure my good friend from Virginia will reverse his opinion once he has been able to read the bill and this excellent amendment in the cool and quiet of one of those lovely Virginia spring evenings.

I rise in support of the Mundt amendment. May I say that in 1924, if I read correctly, the Congress of the United States passed the Oil Pollution Act of 1924. I think that would well take care of the situation with reference to the question of any garages which my good friend has raised.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. KITCHENS. In my section of the country and many other sections of the country they are drilling wells for the discovery of oil, and in doing so they will pump water out of streams, which becomes muddy, and that water is permitted to run back into those streams. In the gentleman's opinion, would this bill require every man who wanted to drill an oil well to obtain a permit before he could begin drilling, and would each well be a new source of controversy?

Mr. HARRINGTON. If the Mundt amendment were adopted, and if the pumping of the oil and the water would create a new source of pollution, I would say that they would be subject to the provisions of the act.

Mr. KITCHENS. I am in favor of preventing pollution of our streams, but I would dislike to do anything that would so handicap certain business that it would make it too expensive for them to operate, such as having to come here to Washington on every occasion to get a permit.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I do not believe the Public Health Service, or this new Board that is set up, and whose members are taken from the Army engineers and the Public Health Service, is in any way interested in doing anything that will prevent any new industry which will give employment from going ahead. They would do nothing to prevent the drilling of new oil wells or the opening of new mines. I am sure they have very good sense.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. In my home county we have a hundred and some drainage districts, which must have an outlet. Under the provisions of this amendment it would be necessary for every drainage district which might in some way contact a barn or a feed lot or water from a barn or feed lot, to go to Washington and get a permit in order to drain that water into a stream, which is a common-law right, which the people have had since time immemorial; that is, the right of the riparian owner to drain into the streams below. We would have to come to Washington and get that permit, would we not?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I think the gentleman is incorrect. In my opinion, unless there is new pollution, that would not be the case. Certainly the drainage ditches which are existing today, which empty into these streams, would not be new pollution, and that is all this amendment applies to.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. But by State law we construct other drains into draining ditches which go to these streams, and it would be a violation of the terms of the amendment.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Is it not fair to say that the term "pollution," insofar as it applies to pollution of streams and water courses, has a very well-defined meaning which has grown up out of the usage and understanding of the people; and that the incidental drainage of a barn lot into a stream would never be held by anybody to constitute pollution such as is contemplated by this amendment? Is it not also fair to say that insofar as the Mundt amendment is concerned the only remedy has to do with injunctive relief; and insofar as the drilling of an oil well is concerned, a temporary operation that might for a very limited period of time bring about temporary pollution of a stream in some measure, would not be the sort of pollution that is contemplated by the amendment now being considered? Furthermore, is it not likely that the temporary pollution would be over and out of the way before it could ever be reached by injunctive relief?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I thank the gentleman. He is an able and distinguished lawyer and I am not. I think that probably his statement answers any question which my good friends from Missouri or Arkansas had in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

Let me ask the Members of the House whether they ever heard that little bit of doggerel that goes like this:

> The other day upon the stair
> I saw a man who wasn't there.
> He wasn't there again today.
> I wish that man would go away.

They have been reading things into the Mundt amendment that simply are not there. It is directed against those who discharge pollution, not against the householders, as our distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] would make us believe. They are reading into this amendment things that simply are not there.

The second section of the amendment makes it contrary to public policy to continue pollution. What a stupid piece of legislation this would be if you will permit an industry at the lower end of a stream to continue polluting and to get money from the Federal Government by means of grant-in-aid; to continue, and let the penalties of the law or restrictions fall upon somebody else. We have had that situation out in Illinois where one city was discharging its sewage into a river and another city simply threw up its hands and said, "We propose to do exactly nothing because our sister city upstream is not doing anything." New pollution must be stopped and existing pollution progressively diminished. That is the one and only remedy for this condition.

If you are going to get anywhere on pollution, we must first establish an absolute standard. Either it is wrong or it is right. If it is wrong, then we must make it a violation of public policy to continue the pollution. That is what the second section of this amendment does. The first section provides discretionary policy in the hands of the director of the division so as to take care of existing situations at least for a little while. If it is wrong to pollute on the 1st day of February 1940, it was wrong 20 years ago and it will be wrong 20 years hence.

There is involved here, of course, a large element of public health. Years ago I used to do some marine contracting on the Illinois River. I have had engineers get some of this putrid and putrescent disposal material in their eyes and had compensation cases to deal with. That is how poisonous the stuff is that is being discharged into the navigable streams of the country today. You cannot temporize with that sort of thing. You might just as well throw this bill in the waste can so far as its effect is concerned unless you establish an absolute standard and say once and for all that pollution is contrary to public policy.

Imagine back in 1905 passing a pure food and drug bill taking cognizance of the abuses that existed at that time but leaving the thing open so far as policy is concerned and saying, "If there are subsequent abuses in misbranding, and in adulteration of foods and drugs we will take care of them later." No; that is not what the Congress did. It said that misbranding and adulteration were wrong. Pollution is wrong and you cannot defend it by getting up on this floor and talking about bureaucratic control of administrative power lodged in some individual in Washington. Somewhere you have got to have a standard. Certainly you cannot have an enforcement of a standard unless it applies to all the States alike. It is the only way that the matter can be properly dealt with in the field of interstate commerce.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If that is the gentleman's view why does he not just advocate the passage of a criminal statute for the pollution of streams and be done with it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me say to my friend, the gentleman from the Labor Committee, that when they passed the Fair Labor Standards Act the first thing they did was to set out the policy. They did not pass a criminal statute and say they would take care of other abuses as they came along, they set a very definite standard and then started to make sure of its enforcement and administration by the presence of an absolute standard.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Where are the standards in this bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are no standards, but we are faced with the necessity for some kind of basic standard. That is precisely what the Mundt amendment does. Without it the bill is not worth the paper it is written on, and we will not have a policy unless the Mundt amendment is adopted. The idea of making Federal funds available to one polluter in order to get rid of pollution and then letting other people who are establishing new industries continue to pollute presents a ridiculous situation. There must be an absolute standard first, then we can deal with it intelligently and reasonably.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman has taken a very prominent part in the last few weeks in reducing expenditures.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does not the gentleman realize that this bill opens the door of the Treasury to a new raid, the extent of which no one can foresee?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I know just what the gentleman is going to say. Knowing the attitude of my friend from Missouri as he pointed out the weaknesses in the bill, I propose, if he does not, to offer an amendment to strike out subsection (c) of section 8. Let us make the thing administratively possible rather than throw it into the discard. Let us correct it by amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN. The only amendment the gentleman from Missouri would offer would be an amendment to strike out the enacting clause.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. In the event the Mundt amendment is adopted, it being an amendment to an amendment, no separate vote could be obtained in the House. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. BLAND. In other words, if the Mundt amendment is voted into the bill, no motion to recommit may be made in the House whereby it could be stricken out because it is an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] for 5 minutes.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in the past few years Congress should have had plenty of experience in the granting of unlimited and undefined powers to bureaus. It seems to me that we have established in the past several years enough of these agencies to run wild throughout the United States and exercise bureaucratic powers to the *n*th degree and oppress the people through unreasonable laws, unreasonable rules, unreasonable decisions, unreasonable judgments that they in possession of bureaucratic power presume to make and enforce upon the people.

There is pending before us, Mr. Chairman, an amendment which is designed to give the bill a sort of window dressing, which is designed to give it favor in the eyes of some who believe we should have legislation with teeth in it to prevent stream pollution. I have been opposed to the pollution of streams for many, many years—in fact, ever since I can remember—and I have been constantly working in favor of legislation of this kind. But here we have what I am very much afraid is an attempt upon the part of those who pretend they are working in the interest of an anti-stream-pollution bill to sabotage their own work, especially when they try to graft into legislation of this kind an amendment which will make it unacceptable in the eyes of so many members of this Committee.

Under this amendment if a farmer were to butcher his hogs and scald them in the old-fashioned oak barrel, with a little wood ash in it, and would empty that water into a stream, he could be prosecuted under the terms of this amendment. If a farmer down in the South somewhere should open up a little sorghum mill to make some sorghum for his own private use, and would empty the rinsings and leavings into the stream, he could be prosecuted under the terms of this amendment. If a farmer up in Pennsylvania or Ohio should open up a little coal mine on his own land to dig coal to keep himself warm during the winter and some of that sulfur water should drain into the stream, he could be prosecuted. If any man, drilling an oil or gas well, put the pumpings of that oil or gas well where they might run into a stream, causing lime, salt water, or some other substance to flow into that stream, then he could be prosecuted under the terms of this bill. If a man set up a little sawmill and the sawdust should fall in a place where it might be washed into a stream, he could be prosecuted under the terms of this bill unless he had previously come down to Washington and secured a permit to operate his own private business on his own private land.

If we are going to do anything about stream pollution, in the name of common sense, let us do something that is reasonable in the matter and not attempt to fasten on the people of the United States another superbureau with bureaucratic powers to go out and oppress the people of this country with any more autocratic rulings, such as some of the bureaus in existence are handing out at the present time.

Let us vote down the Mundt amendment and show the people of the United States that sanity is returning to the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, when the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] said that the Mundt amendment smacked of Hitlerism, I rather discounted the observation, because I thought it was one of those exaggerations in which we all indulge at times; but when this very able and sincere Democratic colleague of ours declared that this amendment, proposed by a Republican, was typical New Deal legislation, then I did become concerned and I wondered whether I had read the amendment right. I read it again and I am reassured. I do not concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia that the Mundt amendment smacks of Hitlerism or that it is typical New Deal legislation.

I do not believe there is anything in the Mundt amendment that should concern those people who, like myself, are opposed to granting broad discretionary powers to executives. The Mundt amendment has only to do with the pollution of navigable streams and navigable streams have always been under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Also, in the exercise of that jurisdiction Federal officers have always and of necessity been given a certain amount of discretionary authority.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado for a question.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The gentleman evidently has not read the amendment.

Mr. MOTT. I yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. It says "navigable streams and their tributaries."

Mr. MOTT. Certainly. It affects navigable streams and their tributaries.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman know that every stream in the United States, no matter how small, is a navigable stream under the terms of existing law unless the Congress of the United States specifically by act of Congress declares it a nonnavigable stream?

Mr. MOTT. I think the gentleman is correct. A navigable stream is defined by statute. Now, when anyone in the United States wants to do anything in connection with a navigable stream he must get permission to do it from the Federal Government. If you want to build a bridge across a stream, you cannot do it without getting a permit from the War Department. If you are a farmer who lives on the bank of a navigable stream and you want to build a pier or wharf out into that stream, you must get a permit from the War Department. If you live on the Columbia River, for example, or on any other fishing stream, and you want to install a fish trap, you must apply for a permit from the Federal Government in order to put in that fish trap. The Federal Government will allow that installation to be made only if it does not interfere with navigation, and the question of whether it does or does not interfere with navigation is decided by the War Department. There is discretionary authority there, but no one would contend that it is dangerous.

The Mundt amendment undertakes to prevent, insofar as possible, the pollution of these navigable streams. It does not go into exhaustive detail in its definition of what stream pollution is any more than existing law goes into detail as to what constitutes interference with navigation. But it requires that the permission of an appropriate agency of the Government shall be obtained before anyone may make a special use of that stream which may result in its pollution.

It is perfectly proper that such a person should make application to the proper Federal agency for a permit to do that, and the agency should have authority to decide whether the thing he contemplates doing will in fact pollute the stream or not. If in the opinion of this agency the thing contemplated to be done will pollute the stream, the permit will not and should not be granted. That is all the discretion there is in this bill. There is sound precedent for it, and I think it is not dangerous. It does not smack of Hitlerism, and, in my opinion, it is not even typical of the general run of New Deal legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I think this bill is a step in the direction we must take eventually, and I believe we ought to do it now. The elimination of stream pollution is essential to the health of the country; I believe everyone will admit that. It is essential to the fish life of the country, and that is a very important thing also. The pollution of streams is fast ruining the fish life of the country. It is destroying sports fishing, to the detriment of everyone. It is destroying commercial fishing, to the detriment of a great industry and to thousands who are dependent upon that industry for their livelihood. The pollution in the Willamette River near its confluence with the Columbia River, where it passes the city of Portland, Oreg., is now so great that a young fingerling salmon 4 or 5 inches long can survive only 10 minutes after being taken from pure water and placed in the polluted water there. The Willamette is the principal tributary of the Columbia, which is the most important and valuable salmon-fishing stream in the world, and which brings to the people of our State an annual revenue of $10,000,000 from its fisheries. We in Oregon would like to see something started that will clean up this situation. I believe the pending bill takes a step in the direction that will accomplish this, and that does it without granting too much discretion to the Federal Government. It is an opportunity that should not be passed over by the Congress at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have read carefully the debate that occurred here on yesterday. I should be very glad to vote for the committee bill, but I am very much confused about the Mundt amendment. I represent a large industry, and I might mention to you that it is the cranberry interests. The cranberry farms, so-called, are generally on a lake or a stream, because flowage is by far the most important feature of that industry. During these latter days all sorts of insects, and constantly new varieties, seem to be found, and many, many kinds of poisons have to be used. There must be constant drainage of those swamps, and they are generally drained into some stream or back into a lake.

I realize the terrific blow that could be administered to that industry. I want to preserve the fishes in the ponds and streams. I fish a good deal in the lakes, but none of those streams or lakes I can think of are used for drinking-water purposes, but some of the poisons would unquestionably be regarded as detrimental to fish life, and, in fact, we know they are.

I want to support the committee bill, but if you force me to vote for something that might jeopardize an industry, I must be well informed before I do so. If this legislation affects that industry, it must apply to other such industries.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I should like to assure the gentleman that his cranberry industry and all other existing industries are perfectly safe within the confines of the so-called Mundt amendment, because it applies only to new sources of pollution, so the new sources of pollution will not affect navigable streams. The amendment will not apply to ponds or lakes or swamps or bogs in any regard or in any way.

Mr. GIFFORD. We are finding new sources of poison all the time and new insects.

Mr. MUNDT. If you find a new insect and a new source of poison, you may still continue to poison the insects by securing the permission of the Public Health Service, exactly as you would get permission if you were going to build a dam or a bridge on a navigable stream.

Mr. GIFFORD. Do not put anything over on me, young man. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday while on the floor I called attention to the fact that the question of stream pollution was not a new one in this country. It goes back more than 20 years. It goes back almost 50 years. Since 1920 the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has had presented to it 65 different bills concerning stream pollution, and in those 20 years how many bills have you passed to solve this problem? One bill, in 1924, known as the oil-pollution bill, which had to do only with oil pollution of coastal waters, was passed. Therefore, in 20 years, out of 65 bills, you have enacted 1 and have not touched the problem as far as our inland waters, rivers, and streams are concerned. We have merely talked about the problem in this country, and in the meantime it has grown steadily worse.

Much has been said about the Mundt amendment. I can visualize a river in the State of Tennessee where there is one industry near the mouth of the river and another one about to be started farther up the river. We abate the nuisance of pollution by the old-established industry near the mouth of the river, and even lend it money in order to stop its pollution of the stream. How inconsistent it would be to permit a new industry farther up the river to start operations and begin the pollution all over again, thus nullifying completely what we have done for the industry near the mouth of the river.

In its broader aspects, all the Mundt amendment does is to prevent new sources of pollution in the future and from undoing all the work we have done through a cooperative attitude by the Federal Government; that is all this amendment does. It simply means that the Federal Government will cooperate with the States because all the police powers of the States are left intact and the States are to control the situation to a very large extent. How futile it would be not to endorse and include the Mundt amendment.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say just now that the condition has been getting worse? I have been hearing a lot of testimony here that we have been making a great improvement.

Mr. DONDERO. I am glad to have the correction. What I meant to say was that in the last few years since we have grappled with the problem we have made strides and progress, but in the years back of that the problem grew steadily worse and we did nothing about it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is assuming that the old offender will be abated. What assurance has the gentleman of that? Would not the Mundt amendment compel the new industry to discharge its sewage properly or process it before discharging it, and thus militate against that industry as compared with the old industry if the old offender was not abated?

Mr. DONDERO. As to the old, established industry's being abated, let me say to the gentleman that if he will look at the record and see the strides that have been made, particularly in the Ohio River Valley in the last few years, with 428 cities correcting the problem and doing so in a cooperative way with the Federal Government, he will see that we certainly have a right to expect that it will be abated.

Mr. CARTER. Then why not go on with that process? What is the necessity of setting up this bureau?

Mr. DONDERO. The answer to that question is that under this bill the cooperative encouragement of the Federal Government is given to the States, cities, municipalities, and industries in aiding them to solve their problem more effectively and expediently.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Is it not argued by those who say that we cannot use direct control in eliminating existing pollution that it will cost too much, that you are interfering with a situation that now exists and that the cost cannot be met? If this argument be true, does it not necessarily follow that the best time to begin to exercise reasonable control of pollution is before it occurs?

Mr. DONDERO. Certainly.

Mr. HALLECK. And the thing to do is to prevent, wherever feasible, and proper, new occuring pollutions coming along, consistent with a program which seeks, so far as possible and practicable, to do away with the unreasonable pollution that now exists.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman is correct, and I might say that in the world of medicine much of the progress that has been made has been in preventive medicine. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MUNDT) there were—ayes 79, noes 51.

Mr. BLAND and Mr. FADDIS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. MUNDT and Mr. BLAND.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 121, noes 65.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOLAN to the committee amendment: After section 5, insert subsection 5 (a), as follows:

"5. (a) Any State, municipality, or other public body which is discharging untreated or inadequately treated sewage or wastes into navigable waters of the United States or streams tributary thereto is hereby declared to be eligible to Federal aid in the form of grants-in-aid and/or loans for the construction of necessary treatment works, in accordance with plans approved by the respective State health authority and the Surgeon General. Such loans and grants-in-aid shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the President, upon the recommendation of the Federal Security Administrator, may prescribe, subject to the following limitations: (1) Grants-in-aid or loans shall be made only upon the certification of the State health authority having jurisdiction and upon approval and recommendation of the Surgeon General; (2) no grant-in-aid shall be made in respect of any project of an amount in excess of 33⅓ percent of the cost of the labor and materials employed upon such project, including the cost of preparation of plans and the carrying of same into execution."

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment simply restores to the Senate bill certain provisions that were contained in that bill. The language of the amendment is in the pending bill, but under the amendment of the committee it is stricken out.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, as set out in the amendments attached to the committee's supplemental report is so innocuous that it might be termed the most feeble legislative gesture at solving a national problem that ever has been proposed to the United States Congress.

We are faced with an extremely vexing problem in my district. According to the California State Department of Public Health, we have 60 percent of California's pollution problem on the eastern shore of San Francisco Bay. When you add the flow of industrial sewage to the problem already created by the discharge of sewage from over a half million homes, the flow of refuse upon the shallow shore line of San Francisco Bay totals the equivalent of a discharge from a 1,200,000 population.

The Federal Government has a direct interest in this pollution, not only because the sludge is clogging up Oakland's inner harbor which has been dredged at Federal expense, nor because two of the largest Pacific Coast shore stations of the Navy are situated in this area, but because of its control over the navigable waters of the San Francisco Bay, it has the common-law interest in the purity of these waters.

Without entering into the merits of the various work projects now being financed by the Federal Government in northern California, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that we have, in the instance of this pollution project, a necessity for an expenditure of $13,000,000, for which we cannot obtain Federal assistance. There is such a necessity for this project that I would put it ahead of our need for school buildings and hospital facilities. We can have Federal funds for hundreds of types of municipal developments, but today the House will deny us direct aid for the most meritorious of all our needed projects.

Our six principal cities have put their heads and their funds together and are presently conducting a $60,000 survey of this project. They are doing their level best to qualify for an allocation of funds under this act as it passed the Senate. They want to rid northern California of a deplorable pollution problem which Dr. Parran of the United States Public Health Service has termed "a filthy mess."

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is absolutely necessary to perfect this bill. What good is an act for water-pollution control that provides for no control, nor does it extend any material inducement for control. That the appropriation authorized for surveys is negligible is apparent when our small San Francisco Bay project would require one-fifth of the amount which is to be allocated to all the States. Finally, no one can maintain that an R. F. C. loan is an inducement at its present rate of interest on loans to municipalities. I hope this amendment is adopted in the interest of a sound program of water-pollution control. [Applause.]

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to make a personal statement, but I feel that under the circumstances I am justified in telling you what I now intend to communicate to you. Because of the interest my people had in the elimination of stream pollution and because the measure was making no progress before the House, I took it upon myself to call upon the President and tell him how much we needed this relief. He said that he did not approve of the bill that was before Congress because it contained the provisions that have just been offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. TOLAN]. He said that they did not meet his approval and that they would unbalance the Budget. He stated he wanted the relief given to the people of the United States, but he did not feel he could approve direct grants, and the committee amendment that is before us was the result of a conference with Jesse Jones, who controls the organization that will make the loans; Surgeon General Parran, of the Public Health Service; Mr. Mansfield; Senator Barkley; and myself. The President said at that time he wanted the relief granted in the manner provided by the committee amendment.

Now, it may be that we are supreme in our legislative functions, but it would be a futile thing to pass legislation that we know will be vetoed by the President. I am hopeful that some remedial legislation will be passed at the present time and I am hopeful that the President will approve that legislation. I feel confident that if you place this amendment in the bill he will veto it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. TOLAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLER to the committee amendment: Section 2, after subsection (c), insert a new subsection (d) as follows:

"(d) Provided, however, That any such compact or agreement shall not be binding or obligatory upon the signatory States unless it has been approved by the legislatures of such States and by the Congress of the United States subsequent to the approval of the various State legislatures."

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, the committee is willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. I do this to state to the House that the amendment that I have just offered is the amendment which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] wrote, and which took the place of an amendment which I should have offered, in view of the position that I felt was necessary under the law; that is to say, that unless we put in this provision the bill would certainly be vetoed by the President; and when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] called my attention to that and himself refused to present the amendment, I took the privilege of doing so myself.

Mr. GAVAGAN. While the committee has agreed to accept the gentleman's amendment, so far as I am concerned, I do not agree to it with any understanding that Congress has no constitutional power to pass this as it is. Congress has control of navigable waters and tributaries thereto, and it has control of treaties made by the States, and it may in advance of those treaties give its consent. The only objection the President had was to the matter of procedure. Congress has all power.

Mr. KELLER. But if the Congress in advance agrees to those compacts, it ties the hands of Congress thereafter; and I fear with that, no matter what the States agree to, it would have been a foolish thing to put in the bill.

Yesterday I called attention to the fact that in the bill that has just been substituted for the Senate bill that in section 2, subsection B, on the line at the top of page 3, we should cut out the words "encourage compacts between the several States for the prevention and abatement of water pollution," and all of subsection C which I quote here:

The consent of the Congress is hereby given to two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts, not in conflict with any law of the United States, for cooperative effort and mutual assistance for the prevention and abatement of water pollution and the enforcement of their respective laws relating thereto, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts.

Pointing out that if the Congress should in advance consent to the compacts by the States, the Congress would thereby tie its own hands from interfering with whatever the States may see fit to do under these compacts and I gave notice that I would present an amendment eliminating that provision. I was pleased to find that the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] had taken exactly the same view of it as I, and I have been advised by a number of other first-class lawyers in the House that this is the correct view, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] fortunately went further in the study of the matter than I had been able to do, and he proposed an amendment which, as I stated above, I presented in lieu of the elimination of the above provision.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] quoted a veto message of President Roosevelt on the subject and which I also here quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 14, 1939, page 15805:

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 11, 1939.

I have withheld my approval of Senate Joint Resolution 139, "To authorize compacts or agreements between or among the States bordering on the Atlantic Ocean with respect to fishing in the territorial waters and the bays and inlets of the Atlantic Ocean on which such States border, and for other purposes."

This joint resolution is not in conformity with the usual and accepted method of granting the consent of the Congress to the execution of interstate compacts or agreements, in that it lacks a provision requiring the approval of the Congress of such compact or agreement as may be entered into before it shall become effective. I believe that it would be unwise to establish the policy of granting in advance the consent of the Congress to interstate compacts or agreements in connection with subjects described only in broad outline as in the Senate Joint Resolution 139.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

It was and is my idea that not only is the question of stream pollution one in which the Government has full control but of which the Government certainly ought to keep control for all time to come. I accepted the Bland amendment instead of my own only on assurance by the committee that the Bland amendment would be accepted by the committee and thus prevented a long-drawn-out discussion. I believe frankly that the States will hardly be able to arrive at any conclusions in the compacts that cannot be better achieved by the Federal Government, and I repeat that I only accepted the Bland amendment instead of my own to prevent a long discussion over it. No harm can come from it because, as it will be observed, after any compacts should be approved by the State legislatures, they would in no way be binding on the Federal Government until they had received the endorsement of the Congress and the signature of the President, and if and when any such compacts should come before the Congress, abundant opportunity will be given to point out the advisability or inadvisability of accepting it. I here want to repeat that, in my judgment, no compacts can be written by any convention of States which would be so effective or so desirable as action which may be taken by the Federal Government.

I do not feel that it is necessary to make the following statement but for the information of the gentlemen who are uninformed of my training along legal lines that while I have not held myself out as being a good lawyer and I have not indulged in the practice of the profession in years, I, nevertheless, doubt whether any man in this House had greater opportunity of growing up in the study of the law, the scholastic training in the law, and the university extension work, and the admittance to the bar in the State of Illinois at the head of a class of 73 in both written and oral examinations. I therefore feel entirely competent to pass on the fundamentals taught in the profession, notwithstanding my lack of recent practice in the profession.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: Page 9, line 16, strike out the word "not."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, a year or two ago one of the agencies downtown appeared before a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and secured what funds it needed for a half dozen different functions. When it came back the following year we learned that they had taken some of the money which had been appropriated for specific purposes, and used much of it to pay for personnel that was later loaned to a Senate committee. We made it plain to them at that time that when Congress appropriated money for a certain function, it ought to be used for that function. The language in the bill at the present time provides that the Public Health Division can use funds out of any appropriation and divert them to that purpose. Obviously that flies in the face of such good appropriation practice, and should not be in the bill. By striking out the word "not" in line 16, it merely means, and it is obvious, that they can use the funds appropriated for the purpose of antistream pollution and for that only, and that they cannot dip into a fund appropriated, say, for some restriction against typhoid fever, and use it for antistream pollution.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman does not mean to imply that a part of the Public Health Service should be prevented from collaborating with another part of it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, no.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman regards that as one of its functions, does he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; but if they are given $250,000 say for antistream pollution, that should be used for that purpose.

Mr. CULKIN. But they can exchange ideas and collaborate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very definitely; and that is not stopped by this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DIRKSEN) there were—ayes 29, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made earlier in the day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, as amended by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we are about to vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN] as amended by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], which, in effect, is whether or not the bill will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARTER) there were—ayes 86, noes 21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEAL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 685) to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 249, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STOPPAGE OF AMERICAN MERCHANT SHIPS AND AIRPLANES BY BELLIGERENTS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report on House Resolution 391 from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 391

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to transmit to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable moment all information as to the American merchant ships and airplanes, by name, that have been stopped by belligerents since September 1, 1939; this information to include in each case the nationality of the belligerent stopping the American ship, the port or ports which the American ship was compelled by the belligerent to enter, the length of time spent in each such port, and the action the belligerent took by way of removal of cargo or mails.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, the information asked for in the resolution is on file in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I therefore ask that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

REPLACEMENT OF CERTAIN BRIDGES ON RIO GRANDE

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 7809) authorizing the reconstruction or replacement of certain bridges necessitated by the Rio Grande canalization project and authorizing appropriation for that purpose.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from New Mexico permit the inclusion of the amendment which we have discussed if the bill is now considered?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will be very glad to; yes.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I have no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state generally what the bill is about? Is this the bill for which a rule has been granted?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes, it is.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman just state briefly what it is about?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The canalization work on the Rio Grande being performed by the State Department through the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, is almost complete. During the canalization work certain of the county bridges have been rendered useless because of a change in the channel of the river. Authority was granted originally under previous law to replace and repair any privately owned or municipally owned structures damaged by this work. They did not give authority to repair county owned bridges, which was just an oversight. The municipally owned bridges have been repaired, and these are county owned bridges, which are in the same category.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. This legislation is made necessary by reason of the fact that the original act provided that privately owned bridges and municipally owned bridges should be replaced, but it omitted to designate county bridges, and they have held that "municipal" does not include "county." There are a number of county bridges which it is necessary to repair or replace in order to carry out the intention of Congress in the original act.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is correct. The bill is recommended by the Department of State and has the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget and the approval of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. Is it not a fact that the intention of the framers of the bill and of the State Department, and also of the Congress, was that county bridges should be included just the same as private and municipally owned bridges?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes. It was intended that any damage done to any bridges would be repaired and structures rendered unusable would be replaced as a matter of public convenience and necessity.

Mr. THOMASON. And it was a technical oversight, was it not? This is a meritorious bill and I very much hope no objection is made to its present consideration.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; that is right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State, acting through the American Section, International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, is authorized to reconstruct or replace certain bridges over the Rio Grande within the Rio Grande canalization project known as the Courchesne, Country Club, Borderland, and Vinton Bridges in El Paso County, Tex., and the Berino, Vado, Mesquite, Shalem, and Hatch-Rincon Bridges in Dona Ana County, N. Mex., and such other bridges within said project as the Secretary of State may determine to include.

SEC. 2. That notwithstanding the limitation imposed on the total cost of construction of the Rio Grande canalization project by section 2 of the act entitled "An act authorizing construction, operation, and maintenance of Rio Grande canalization project and authorizing appropriation for that purpose," approved June 4, 1936, there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $350,000, which shall be in addition to appropriations heretofore authorized for such project, for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of section 1 hereof, other than for operation and maintenance, including salaries and wages, fees for professional services; rents, travel expenses; per diem in lieu of actual subsistence; printing and binding, lawbooks, and books of reference; purchase, exchange, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger- and freight-carrying vehicles; hire, with or without personal services, of work animals and animal-drawn and motor-propelled vehicles and equipment; acquisition by donation, condemnation, or purchase of real and personal property; transportation (including drayage) of personal effects of employees upon change of station; telephone, telegraphic, and air-mail communications; rubber boots for official use by employees; ice; equipment, services, supplies, and materials and other such miscellaneous expenses as the Secretary of State may deem necessary properly to carry out the provisions of the act: Provided, That the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5) shall not apply to any purchase made or service procured when the aggregate amount involved is $100 or less: Provided further, That no part of the appropriation herein authorized shall be expended for the construction of any of the bridges to be located within any county until the governing body of such county has given assurance satisfactory to the Secretary of State—

(a) That it will cause to be furnished, without cost to the United States, evidence satisfactory to the American Commissioner, International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, that title to all lands or easements in lands which may be designated by the said American Commissioner as necessary for the construction, operation, and maintenance of the bridges and approaches, the title to which is not vested in the United States, is vested in the county;

(b) That it will perform without cost to the United States all work involved in any required changes, including changes in pavements or other road surfaces, in the approaches or approach roads to the bridges to be located within such county;

(c) That it will, upon notification by the said American Commissioner that any bridge has been completed, take over and operate and maintain such bridge; and

(d) That it will hold the United States harmless on account of any damage or claim of damage arising out of or in any way connected with the construction, operation, or maintenance, or failure to operate and maintain, any bridge or bridges or any part thereof located within such county;

And provided further, That no part of the appropriation herein authorized shall be expended for the construction of any of the bridges to be located in Dona Ana County, N. Mex., until the governing body of said county has given assurance satisfactory to the Secretary of State that it will remove or rebuild, in accordance with plans and specifications to be approved by the American Commissioner, the bridges known as Old Anthony Bridge and Salem Bridge.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 8, after the word "bridges", insert "county."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VORYS of Ohio: Page 3, line 6, after the word "less", insert "and provided that not more than $3,500 shall be expended for the purchase of real property and expenses incidental thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House Resolution 399 will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next after the legislative program for the day and the special order that I may address the House for 20 minutes.

There was no objection.

THE LATE HONORABLE WILLIAM A. DICKSON

Mr. McGEHEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McGEHEE. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to announce to the membership of this body the death of a former Member, the Honorable William A. Dickson, of Centreville, Miss., who served during the Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congresses.

Mr. Dickson was a grandson of Dr. William Winans, a pioneer Methodist minister, who immigrated from Pennsylvania to Mississippi territory and established his home near Centreville, and whose grave is a shrine of Southern Methodist.

Mr. Dickson served his county and State in many capacities prior to his election to Congress. He received his degree in law but never practiced his profession, spending his entire life when not actively engaged in performing the duties of the office he held following his greatest love, that is, agricultural pursuits. He was one of the greatest orators it has been my privilege to hear; he was a statesman of the years-ago type. He was respected, loved, and was a great factor in the progress and upbuilding of his section.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, as long as there are a very large number of Republicans here, I ask their attention for a minute or two.

Mr. Speaker, I have learned in one way and another that there is an insistent demand throughout the country to amend the National Labor Relations Act. I have learned that many of the Republicans, as well as a few Democrats and new dealers, want that act amended. I have been wondering why it was that we did not get about the business of doing what the people wanted us to do.

The Smith committee has disclosed enough of a situation which does not appeal to very many of us, so that we have information justifying the abolition of the Board. If I read the signs correctly, some day Congress will get rid of that Board; and as long as we are going to do it, we might just as well do it now as to wait until additional industries have been closed.

Not only that but the Smith committee has disclosed weaknesses in the law itself. There is no question about it. I know that Mr. Pressman, before the House Committee on Labor, stated there was no demand throughout the country for the amendment of this law. There is not, of course, any demand among the Communists; and Mr. Pressman, counsel for the C. I. O., has been engaged in activities which have done a great deal to further the interests of the Communists.

It being true that a majority of the House wants this law amended, there is no reason why we should not start now. The chairman of the Committee on Labor the other day said out here in the corridor that the House Labor Committee was going to wait until the Smith committee finished its investigation.

The Smith committee, we are told, next week or the week after, will make a report; then the matter will go to the House Labor Committee. But that report of the Smith committee is to be a preliminary report; it is not to be the final report.

The chairman of the House Committee on Labor controls that committee; there is no question about that. If the chairman of that committee is going to wait for the final report of the Smith committee, it will be along toward the last of March or the first of April before we will get anywhere at all with the House Committee on Labor. The only way we will ever get out a bill to amend the national labor relations law and take care of and discipline that Board the way you want it to be disciplined and taken care of will be by discharge petition. If we wait 2 or 3 weeks for the Smith committee to come along and make a preliminary report, then if the chairman of the House Committee on Labor holds up that report, waiting for the Smith committee to make its final report, where are we going to get? We will be doing just the same as we have been doing for more than a year—just nothing at all, except hold hearings. You might as well put an old hen to setting on a nest full of doorknobs and expect a hatching of Plymouth Rock chicks as to proceed as we have been doing for more than a year.

There are two or three members of the House Labor Committee present, and if I am not correct, I would like to hear from them. We will continue to have the situation of getting nowhere at all unless we can get a discharge petition signed. That is the reason I put petition No. 23 on the desk. It does not make any difference whether you like the bill I introduced a year ago in March or not. Let us bring out some bill under an open rule, then amend it on the floor as you wish to have it amended; otherwise we will not get any action during this present session.

Republicans have been acting in good faith, and I can see no reason why we should not do something now to bring this matter before the House at this time or as soon as we can get it up for consideration? Why wait and let the Labor Committee fool along and the session come to an end with nothing done? There is only one good reason I can think of for that course, and that is that the failure to amend the N. L. R. A. is some of the best campaign material we can get; but that is a poor reason if we have in mind the interest of our country as a whole. That is why I am speaking to you today. That is why I have spoken so often before. Let us show our good faith by doing our utmost to bring before the House a bill under an open rule, debate it, then act, and let responsibility for refusing to abolish the Board and amend rest upon the majority side.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOOK. The gentleman is an attorney. He would not want a case to go before a jury with only half of the evidence in? Does he not believe that the House Labor Committee should have all the evidence before it decides?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The House Labor Committee has had 10 months. I am an attorney, but if I were on a jury trying a man for robbery, when I had evidence enough to know that the man was guilty of robbery I would not care much about other evidence. I would convict him of the offense of which he was charged and shown to be guilty and disregard evidence of other alleged offenses.

Mr. HOOK. The gentleman would not care about what defense was put in?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I did not say that at all. I said when the evidence showed conclusively guilt of the offense charged I would act after the one accused had been heard in his own defense. The gentleman does not defend the activities of this Labor Board, does he?

Mr. HOOK. Well, I want to know what the facts are before I make my decision.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does not the gentleman know now?

Mr. HOOK. I do not want to decide on half facts.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does not the gentleman know now?

Mr. HOOK. I certainly do not know.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does not the gentleman know the Labor Board has had full opportunity before the Smith committee to present its case, that the Labor Board has been in charge of the time for almost a week, and does not the gentleman know that over before the House committee the C. I. O. attorney, Pressman, has had 3 hours on one occasion and that he put in 300 pages of typewritten statement, refusing absolutely to answer simple questions directly? Does not the gentleman know that the Board took up days before the Senate committee and before the House committee, last year and again this year, in presenting their view?

Mr. HOOK. If the gentleman is correct, why does not the Smith committee close its hearings?

(At this point certain words used in debate were, by unanimous consent of the House, withdrawn from the RECORD.)

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman's words taken down. I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words taken down.

The Clerk read as follows:

I presume they want to pile up such a mountain of damaging testimony against that Board and the unfairness of the law so that even the gentleman from Michigan, who never can tell whether a document has been forged or whether it has not——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the reference made in the words taken down of the gentleman from Michigan relate to his colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK], who the Chair understands is the gentleman that requested that the words be taken down.

Mr. HOFFMAN. In answer to a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was referring to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK], as the Chair understands it?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I was answering a question the gentleman asked me, and I did not complete the sentence, which I should like to do.

The SPEAKER. The rule on the conduct of Members in debate is that a Member, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personality. The Chair is of the opinion that the phrase used by the gentleman in connection with the statement in reference to his colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK], "who never can tell whether a document has been forged or whether it has not," transgresses the rule and is a personality.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the Chair permit me to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. When I am asked a question by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK], then how can I make reply without referring to him personally?

The SPEAKER. In reply to the question, the Chair suggests that the gentleman might say, "In response to the inquiry of my colleague from Michigan."

The gentleman from Michigan himself has invoked this rule regarding personalities on several occasions and the gentleman is very familiar with the rule. The Chair has sustained the attitude of the gentleman from Michigan on most of those occasions. The Chair thinks the gentleman should withdraw the words in question; at least, the Chair holds that they transgress the rule.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, may I submit a unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to withdraw those words, and to substitute in their place the statement that I presume the Smith committee wanted to pile up a mountain of evidence showing the maladministration carried on by the Board, and the serious defects in the law itself, so that any gentleman in or out of the House might know for a certainty that we should amend the law at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. HOOK. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. Is the present status of this matter that everything that has been said will appear in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The words have not been withdrawn or expunged, therefore they will appear in the RECORD. The Chair has ruled with reference to their propriety.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to table the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I object to his withdrawing the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is withdrawn.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to table the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 27, noes 35.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Two of them, in fact. The first is that I may be permitted to withdraw the words, and the other is that my special order for next Monday may stand.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the first request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman already has his special order for next Monday.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House heretofore entered, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

TRANSCONTINENTAL HIGHWAYS

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, this is the fifth consecutive year that I have had the pleasure and privilege of calling the attention of the House to the advisability of building a system of transcontinental and north-and-south highways across the United States.

As you will recall, I said last year in presenting this measure to the House that when I first presented it it seemed the major element of importance in building such a system of highways was transportation of commodities of all kinds. This would not only save time but money.

After further study it was brought out that inasmuch as industry was not absorbing the hundreds of thousands of unemployed, the building of such a system of highways over a space of years would give worth-while employment to a large group of men.

Then, about 2 years ago, when the wars across the waters created certain international problems, it was almost unanimously agreed that such a system of highways completed would be a major factor in national defense, in that we would have greater flexibility and thus greater economy.

During these recent years the problem of slum clearance of our cities has been talked of, and in some respects different Government agencies have taken steps toward solving this problem. From many parts of the United States people have written me and called my attention to the fact that such a system of highways as I propose would be a real major procedure in helping to solve the overcrowded city population problem.

You recall that I propose these highways should not run through the cities, that they shall bypass the cities at a safe distance.

I hold in my hand a copy of the message from the President of the United States transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, concurred in by the Secretary of War, inclosing a report of the Bureau of Public Roads, United States Department of Agriculture, on the feasibility of a system of transcontinental toll roads and a master plan for free highway development. This House Document No. 272, transmitted by the President April 27, 1939, is a most commendable document indeed. The Bureau of Public Roads and other agencies that had to do with gathering the data, compiling it, and furnishing Congress with the information, deserve much credit. It is only from such data, statistics, and findings that we can formulate plans that will eventually crystallize into a reality.

As you will observe on the map here, my plan calls for three highways running east and west and six running north and south. These highways are spoken of sometimes as superhighways, transcontinental highways, and so forth. I believe this report refers to them as intersectional highways. I believe their plan calls for running these highways right into the cities. I think it would be a mistake in building highways of this magnitude to run them into the large cities.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Why do you end one of these north and south highways at the lower end of Lake Michigan instead of going on through to the end of Wisconsin?

Mr. SNYDER. I am sorry that was not done. I was going to do that, but I did not have the time to take it back. It should go right along here [indicating].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman does not intend then, under his program, to have this highway end at the Illinois State line but end at the Canadian-Wisconsin border?

Mr. SNYDER. That is exactly it and that is what is called for in my speech, but I did not have the red tape to put it on the map here.

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Did I understand correctly that the gentleman intends to stay out of the big cities entirely and just go around them, under this highway plan?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes, I do. Further on I would like for your comment on what I am about to say in that respect. I believe, however, that their plans call for running these highways into the cities. I think it would be a great mistake to build highways of this magnitude and run them into our cities, and if you will follow me for a moment I will be glad to have your comments, either pro or con, on that phase of this great and important question, because I believe, I may say by way of parenthesis before taking up the next paragraph here, that we are all agreed that such a system is going to be built. It may be it will not run along the same lines as I have suggested, but such a general system of highways is going to be built, whether you think so or I think so, because, as the Nation is being built up, they have got to build such a system of highways for our transportation, and when we build them, we might as well build them for a thousand years as to build them for 10 or 15 or 20 years, and you cannot build them for a thousand years by running them into the cities, as I will show you in a moment.

In these days we are interested in decentralizing the population of our cities—not adding to it. We are spending money through various Government agencies, such as Federal Housing, United States Housing, to clear up slum districts in the cities. Slum districts in certain of our large cities have been materially helped during the last few years all of which is commendable.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we are thinking in terms of community-building and Nation-building construction that is to be handed down through the generations to come, it seems to me the one big thing that we could do at this time would be to build such highways as my bill calls for that would pass close to the cities but not directly through them.

For instance, if we were to build a highway from Baltimore to Columbus, St. Louis, Salt Lake City, and San Francisco, it should not pass through any of these cities. It should be made as straight as possible, and if it happens to be 10 or 20 miles from a large city, all the better. We can have byroads leading from such highways into the large cities.

We have all observed that when a permanent road is built from one city to another the people in those cities will buy acreage out along the road and move from the city out there.

We also find that things have changed from a standpoint of manufacture. These days much of the manufacturing is done by electricity and much of the transportation is done by truck. If we had these highways, hundreds of manufacturing concerns would move their manufacturing plants away from the congested parts of the city, down by the water front or railroad front, out along these highways, and thus be able to not only manufacture their commodities cheaper, but they would be on the highways they were going to use in distributing their products.

Our cities sprung up in our valleys, at the junction of rivers, at certain appropriate coastal fronts and harbors, largely because the railroads had to seek as level a surface as possible in building the railroads, and they found that to be along the river-bed levels.

Instead of taking these commodities by truck and rail into the cities, as they are largely doing now, and thus creating a more congested population, my plan would draw the people out along these highways to build their factories, build their homes, and distribute their manufactured products much more economically.

Furthermore, the land values along these highways for miles and miles back of each of them would be increased. The farm-truck growers would have facilities that would enable them to distribute their commodities at less cost than they are now being distributed.

My friends, if these highways were completed today as set forth in my bill—some 16,000 miles—in less than 20 years we would have at least 10,000,000 of our population living along these highways; and most of them, I believe, would be in homes that they owned.

The more home owners you have in a democracy the easier it is to perpetuate a democracy in any nation. If home owners in a nation drop below 40 percent of the population it is not only extra expensive but extraordinarily difficult to perpetuate a democracy.

I have been informed by the fruit growers associations, from the East and West, as an example, that if such highways were completed today they could distribute their commodities to the consumers at from 12 to 15 percent less than they now distribute them. That could be said also of manufactured products from our manufacturing centers that must be distributed through the Nation.

I hear some of you asking, "What about the cost of such a system of highways?" Well, as set forth in my bill, it would cost approximately one-half million dollars a mile.

Up in Pennsylvania today we are building a turnpike highway from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg. The present distance you are obliged to travel between these two cities is about 206 miles. The distance on the new highway, when completed, will be approximately 161 miles. This highway will have four lanes, and the grade will not be more than 3 percent at any one point, and no sharp curves will be on it.

This highway is being built by a grant from the Federal Government and a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at a cost of approximately $61,000,000. It will be completed about July 1, 1940, according to contracts. This will be a great highway, and before construction was started much research and study was given to the possibility of travel on this highway. They found that all types of business favored its construction. The big truckers favored it especially.

For instance, it is figured that large trucks, that will be charged $10 toll on this road from one end to the other, will willingly pay this because they will be saving more than $10 a trip by using this road instead of the up-and-down mountain highway.

Instead of taking 12 or 15 hours to make the trip, it will take only about 5 hours for such a truck to make the trip, and that will be a saving of about two-thirds in time the driver will consume—to say nothing of gas, oil, and wear on the truck.

This turnpike was started under the Earle administration about 2½ years ago. When the present administration came into power, Governor James had expressed opposition to going on with the highway; but after he gave it thorough study he decided to cooperate and has cooperated toward its completion. Now, instead of opposing it, he advocated that it be extended from Harrisburg toward Philadelphia and New York.

Another group met in Chicago recently and advocated the extension of this highway from Pittsburgh on west through Ohio and Illinois.

So you see the day of such highways is here, and I think that the Congress of the United States should take action that will result in seeing to it that these highways are built so they will last not only 50 years but 1,000 years, and that they will be built to serve all the people instead of certain communities.

During the last few years we have strengthened our national-defense set-up from every angle. We are going to continue to do that, but I believe that my colleagues will all agree with me when I say that a system of highways such as I propose would be a greater contribution to national defense in case of an emergency than any other one item.

Our national-defense installations are not for aggression. We are preparing so that in case any foreign foe would choose to disturb our institutions, either on our shores or inland, that we could prevent them from doing so. Such a system of highways would enable us to put on rubber wheels practically all of our Army equipment—such as guns, antiaircraft material, trucks, tanks, and what not—and move them in a short space of hours from any one point of the United States to another point.

Another feature of these roads as set forth in my bill is that they will be 100 feet wide, thus providing 8 lanes of traffic with a 500-foot right-of-way. No obstruction would be allowed on such rights-of-way, such as telephone poles, light poles, signs, and so forth. That would mean that the long stretches across the continent—take for instance the middle highway as I have set forth to run from Baltimore to San Francisco—could be used as an emergency landing field. Of course we would have the 18 airports at the intersections as the bill calls for. In other words, we would have a main street across the Nation. At night it would be lit up as any main street in our large cities today.

Our air service would always be safe from the standpoint of having safe-landing facilities. We would have radio stations at intervals along these highways and if a plane would be in trouble, all the pilot would have to do would be to radio down that he was going to land in section 17 or 18 in 2 or 3 minutes. The radio operator would then stop traffic and enable a mile or two of the highways to be a landing field for that emergency.

In reading this report I notice they have counted traffic on certain highways and have based their conclusion on certain types of roads to be construted to take care of that amount of traffic. If the traffic load seemed to be heavy they would build a highway to take care of more traffic at that particular point.

I doubt the wisdom of such a procedure—that is, if we are looking forward 100 years from now as to taking care of our traffic problem, population, and farmers.

In other words, I think we should build these highways so it will give opportunity for expansion of business, industry, and manufacturing, to come out along these highways instead of trying to crowd men into the same areas that we now have, and thus add to the congestion and more difficult living conditions.

We have made wonderful progress in the last few years in stabilizing our economic and social forces. We have put several million more men to work, but we still have other millions to put to work. We find we are now turning out as many tons of steel as we did in certain months 20 years ago when things were at a peak—yet we are not employing one-third as many men to turn out this commodity. In other words, machinery has replaced the men. So it is in every industry—not only the steel industry.

Therefore, we should put these men to work on worth-while projects—and no project that I can think of would be more worth while than this highway program. We could put a million or more men to work for the next 8 years on this system of highways, and their children would have something to point to with pride as an accomplishment in years to come.

I have included in my bill the language:

> There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $8,000,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this act. * * *

However, I am not tied to that. I would prefer to see the roads built with private capital given out by contract to the lowest bidder.

For the last 25 years our people have drifted into a piecemeal financial procedure along all lines. A number of States have a sales tax. They take a few pennies from everybody for most of the things they use in everyday life. Business concerns are educating our people to pay so much a week on this or that article. Insurance companies have taught our people to pay so much a week on insurance policies. Business concerns as well as the Government have resorted to paying employees once a week or every 2 weeks—making everything piecemeal.

So you have a people educated to doing things in little dribbs. That being the case, the toll highways would be in keeping with the other practices. I have always favored gasoline tax. The fellow who does not have a car or does not use his car does not have to pay the tax. The same would be true of toll highways. You say he would pay indirectly. Of course, he would pay indirectly. We pay indirectly for everything that we use and the other fellow uses.

I am going to give this one instance as a citation, with your kind permission. When I first came to Washington 8 years ago, my wife and I, coming from the country, we would drive out in the country, and on one occasion we went out to Soldiers' Home and then drove down Blair Road. I think you know where that road is. I thought they had a planning commission here in the city of Washington that would not allow them to do certain things, and maybe it is all right and maybe I am all wrong about it, coming from the country as I do, but when I went out there this spring I was really, I might say, chagrined, because I found that they had allowed them to go out there and build a whole row of houses along an entire block, just like one solid house. We would call it a shed out on the farm. Perhaps it was five or six hundred feet long. They put porches and steps and a door here and call that a home. Then they would put a porch and a door at another point and call it a home, and then sell a slice of it to some fellow for a home.

That is the way we used to do in the mining towns in western Pennsylvania, because they would usually be temporary. In my own county we built mining towns like that, and we would just build long strings of houses and divide them with partitions and put people in there as an emergency for the mining work, because, perhaps, the mine would be worked out in 8 or 10 or 15 years, but here in the city of Washington that same general plan is being followed right in the Capital of the United States. You have noticed around Philadelphia, if you were ever over there, and around Baltimore, where they did this kind of building 30 or 40 years ago, the slum clearance has now reached out to them and they are trying to do away with that sort of building; but right here in the Nation's Capital they have built a lot of them of that same type within the last 2 or 3 years. My comment, from what little I know about preparing for generations yet to come, is that they should not be allowed to build such strings of houses in this day and age and divide them up into coops to shove people in and then allow them to invest their money in one slice of such a house, when they do not know who is going to move to the right of them or who is going to move to the left of them in the next 5 or 10 years, or whether its value will jump up or jump down because of what might be shoved onto the right or left of them.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Unfortunately, I was not in the Hall when the gentleman began his address, but about what would be the construction cost of the gentleman's program, including the rights-of-way?

Mr. SNYDER. About $8,000,000,000.

Mr. DOUGHTON. How long does the gentleman think it would take to construct them?

Mr. SNYDER. Eight or sixteen years.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Would the roads be free roads or toll roads?

Mr. SNYDER. I have left that question open as to whether they should be toll roads or free roads. I have a comment I want to make on that.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Would they be for general-traffic roads—that is, commercial roads—or just tourists' roads? Would large, heavy busses and trucks and things of that kind that push people off the highways be permitted to travel on these roads?

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman for that inquiry. I am pleased to say to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina that these roads, running 16,000 miles, approximately, would be 100 feet wide, with eight lanes of traffic, with a clearance of 200 feet on either side, making a 500-foot highway the whole distance across the Nation. Certain lanes of traffic would be for heavy trucks and certain lanes for lighter trucks. There would be certain lanes for speed trucks, up to 90 or over 100 miles an hour.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The trucks and busses would be separated from the ordinary lanes?

Mr. SNYDER. They would have their own lanes of travel, and I might go ahead and say in connection with that that there are two aspects of this project. I took the matter up with the California Fruit Growers' Association and also with the Southern Fruit Growers' Association and certain textile people. They tell me that if these highways were completed now, they could distribute their fruit products from the West to the East at a 12 to 15 percent less cost to the consumer than they can now distribute such products.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. And that would mean that they could do that because of the subsidy furnished by the Federal Government in providing a roadbed, and that would be the beginning of a proposition to put out of business and destroy the railroads.

Mr. SNYDER. And may I answer the gentleman there in respect to the subsidy and say that while my bill calls for $8,000,000,000 out of the Treasury, I would rather that private industry build the roads, which would be perhaps toll roads. Let me say this about the toll roads: I know everyone will be interested in what I am about to speak of. Some of you have heard about it, but you have not had the opportunity to know about it as I have. In Pennsylvania we are building what they call a turnpike highway from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg. Already there are two highways there—the Lincoln Highway and the William Penn Highway, two to four lanes wide. The distance over those two highways are approximately 206 miles. This new turnpike was begun by a grant when we had the P. W. A., plus a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to be built at a cost of $61,000,000. It will shorten the route from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg from 206 to 160 miles, with four lanes of travel, with no grade over 3 percent, and no curves on it where you cannot see about 2,000 feet ahead. The comment is this: They expected that it would take 16 years to liquidate this loan from the Government, but now, as it is nearing completion—and they expect to throw it open July 1—the trucking companies and all kinds of companies are coming in for rates; and they find in the estimate now that in 10 years this will be liquidated because of the use that is going to be made of it. For instance, it now costs a 10-ton truck loaded to capacity $37 to go up and down those mountains to move that load from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg. When the new road is constructed, instead of its taking from 12 to 15 hours to do that, they expect to do it in 5 hours; and the cost, instead of being $37, they expect will be $17 to move that load from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg, a saving of $20. The way it is set up now is that they will charge $10 toll for a truck of that kind and $1.25 for an ordinary automobile for use of the road over those 160 miles.

Now, if you were in Pittsburgh and you were going to Harrisburg, you would have a choice of one of these routes. It is 206 miles by the present roads, and it is up and down at least seven mountains. Or you could go over this new highway. There will be no compulsion about it. The people do not have to use this road, because there are two splendid highways paralleling this. They cross over and under at least several times. But we people in America, the greatest people on earth, have been trained to do things by bits. Personally, I have never supported what we call the sales tax, but I have been in the State of Alabama and in the State of California and in the State of Ohio on some army inspection tours, and I drop in to buy this or that or to buy some food, and I find that they will tax me for even my food a few cents extra. These high-powered salesmen come around to our homes and they will sell a sweeper, or this, that, or the other, and we pay in dribs. Even the Government got down to the practice of paying in dribs, paying every week. Personally, I am opposed to that. I think the much better practice would be to pay every month, so that they would get something in their hands that would look worth while. But the point I am trying to build up is that we have educated our people through all of these different processes to little dribs of payments, and they do not mind paying the toll now as they did 20 years ago. They pay their tolls without any question. I would say that 90 percent of the people if they were in Pittsburgh and wanted to go to Harrisburg, no special reason for them to get there, would inquire about the highways. They would be told, "You can go over the Lincoln Highway. It is a two-lane road, very beautiful, 206 miles, over the mountains. You can go over the William Penn Highway." And they would tell them about that. Or they would say, "You can go over the new turnpike and you can make 60 to 90 miles per hour. There are no curves on it to speak of," and so forth.

I say 90 percent of them would pay the $1.25 and go on the new highway and buzz their way to Harrisburg.

The point I want to make in connection with all that is, it does not matter which procedure we go through to build these highways, whether by private contract or whether the Government loans the money to certain corporations with certain specific regulations, or how we do it.

One of those regulations, before I forget it, is that all those who are above 50 years of age would be employed first. That is, it would give employment to those men that industry has set aside and will no longer take back. That would give employment to that large group. We might even go down to 45 years of age on such a proposition.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. THILL. There are a lot of young boys between the ages of 18 and 22 or 24 who are unemployed.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. THILL. Would you give them work, too?

Mr. SNYDER. I am glad you mentioned that. The group of older men that would take these places first, if they could not fill all the places the young men would be given the next chance. One of the greatest dangers to this Nation is that we have too many young men whose minds and hearts are not employed and their footsteps are not being guided in the right direction at this particular time.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman indicated that the program would cost about $8,000,000,000.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In the words of another distinguished Member of the House from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], "Where are you going to get the money?"

Mr. SNYDER. As I say, my friend, if we build it under contract authorization, like we are building this turnpike, we would liquidate it in so many years; the money would all come back.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under your program you do not intend to commence the building of all of the roads at once, do you?

Mr. SNYDER. Well, that would be a matter that would have to be decided. If I were to do it I would build No. 2 highway first across the Nation. Then I would build this one second and I would build that one third, that is, if we built them piecemeal. If I would start this one I would start it over here where the population is great, and where we need a lot of employment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman thought of using W. P. A. labor? If you start construction of one of these highways, will not the employment on such highway be far more beneficial to America than producing burlesque shows such as Up in Mabel's Room, Swing Mikado, and many similar activities of the W. P. A.?

Mr. SNYDER. Very much more so. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. I wonder if the gentleman has enumerated in his tables and statistics here how much concrete, stone, sand, and gravel, and building materials, man-hours and man-days of work on such a project as this would be provided for people, directly and indirectly, in this country?

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion. The cost of building the highway per mile in Pennsylvania is $350,000 a mile. Now we go through seven mountains. There will be seven tunnels on this road. Some of them are short. I think one of them is a mile and a half long.

To buy a right-of-way 500 feet wide would cost approximately $500,000 a mile. In some rocky, swampy places it would cost more, and that through level land would cost less. Following out the suggestion made by the gentleman, in addition to putting a million men a year directly to work, the building of this system would put another million men to work in collateral lines preparing and furnishing the materials entering into this great Nation-building structure; and if I had my way, I would build it like the Appian Way was built, to last 1,000 years.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. THILL. I notice on the map the gentleman is using there are indicated six north-and-south highways, three in the eastern half of the United States and three in the western half. Does not the gentleman think it would be more advisable to put more highways in the more populous East than in the less populous West?

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I might say in answer to the gentleman's inquiry that a study of the eastern half of the country showed that there were a great many parallel highways of the type I spoke of in the case of the new turnpike running between Pittsburgh and Harrisburg; and that is why this adjustment was reached.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. How wide did the gentleman say the right-of-way for the highway would be?

Mr. SNYDER. Five hundred feet.

Mr. PARSONS. Has the gentleman figured how much productive land that would take out of cultivation in the agricultural areas?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; but I have not the figures with me. I will insert them at this point. I think that would not be objectionable because we are taking a lot out of cultivation by law anyhow.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman thinks it might be a step in the right direction looking to the relief of the farm problem.

Mr. SNYDER. I think so, and a step in the direction of putting men to work.

Mr. PARSONS. I notice that on the map the gentleman has indicated a highway running, I believe, from Chicago directly south.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Does that go to New Orleans or does it stay east of the Mississippi River?

Mr. SNYDER. It goes to Baton Rouge.

Mr. PARSONS. It crosses, then, the Illinois, the Ohio, and the Mississippi on its way to Baton Rouge.

Mr. SNYDER. That is it exactly.

Mr. PARSONS. And then goes on down to New Orleans.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. It has developed during the course of the gentleman's talk that the construction of these highways would greatly relieve unemployment and would relieve the farm problem in the manner just related by our distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS]. Would not the building of at least one or two of these highways greatly increase the effectiveness of our national defense and enable us thereby to reduce many of the excessive expenditures we are now making for national defense?

Mr. SNYDER. I had intended to comment on that later in my speech, but I will do it right now since the gentleman has raised the question. That is one of three important objectives to be achieved by the building of this system of highways. The first is general transportation, the second is relief of unemployment, and the third is a strengthening of our national defense.

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Another thought that occurs to me in connection with the building of this system of highways would be that it would enable people to move from congested areas out into the country where they might have little farms to help them eke out a living.

Mr. SNYDER. I am coming to that. Speaking for the moment about national defense, if these roads were in existence today, or on April 1, 1941, with the advances we have made in motorized rubber-wheel equipment in the Army, we could cut $100,000,000 from our national-defense program that year and still have greater efficiency in national defense than we have ever had; and in 3 years we could jump the saving to $200,000,000, for by that time all our equipment will be motorized and on rubber wheels, even the 12-inch guns.

The rest is on wings. In 72 hours we could have any of our equipment at any place where there might be an emergency, if we had a sort of concentration area in the middle of the country. In making these statements I draw on my experience of having visited practically every military establishment in continental United States and our possessions. Not only would we save money in case of a real emergency but we would save money on every one of our big Army maneuvers. That is not all. We know that in 12 hours we can go with airplanes from any place in the United States to any other place. In 72 hours we could go any place on rubber wheels with everything we have except above 12-inch guns. In keeping with what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] said, over a period of years, in connection with national defense alone—say, in 40 or 50 years—these roads would pay for themselves by reduction in national-defense installations.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If we constructed a system of roads of that kind, what would eventually become of our railroads that apparently the Government is going to have to take over ultimately?

Mr. SNYDER. May I say this before answering the gentleman's question: In building these highways, we built Route 40. We call this Route 40.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRINGTON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, we would have a main street clear across the Nation. It would be lit up at night. You would not put in any lights higher than the curb at the side. You may say that I am an extremist in this thing, and perhaps I may be, but you can visualize airplane traffic in 10, 15, or 20 years going from East to West. Now, there would be a main street clear across the Nation, lit up all the time and no longer would we have crashes in the Rocky Mountains. How would we do that? This is not new. It is just the same as they are doing in Germany today. They have a route over there running from Brussels to Berlin.

Now, we would have radio stations all along the line and we would divide it up like the railroads did into sections. I do not know whether a section would be 5 or 10 miles, but there would be a radio station at each of these sections. A pilot gets into trouble. He radios that he will land in section 17, 16, or 87, if he is out here, in 3 minutes. They close the traffic on either side and he has an emergency landing field clear across the Nation.

My bill also calls for 18 big air bases, one at each of these crossroads. Now this is just exactly what the railroads did. The railroads built their main lines, then they run branch lines out from the main line. What would happen here? The shuttle air lines will run out to these main air lines, there they will pick up passengers and commodities on the main-line routes across the Nation. That is happening already. In 15 or 20 years from now you will be amazed to see what will take place along the lines of such procedure.

I am glad the gentleman from Montana brought up that question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman include in his answer to the question just what will become of the millions of men employed by railroads if we substitute the gentleman's road system for the railroads?

Mr. SNYDER. I have been conducting hearings on the Army bill.

Mr. RANKIN. They would drive automobiles.

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman. I have been conducting hearings on the Army bill today. We are doing away with a certain number of horses. The question was asked of the general who was sitting across the table, "What are you going to do with these men who have been doing this work with horses, trucks, and so forth?" The general had an answer, and he had them all classified. He stated: "We have taken so many men, and we are having them as truck drivers. We are taking so many men, and we are making them caretakers at the places where we fix the trucks." They had it all figured out how they were going to take care of the men.

May I make another statement right here? I happen to be a very personal friend of the president of one of our railroads, one of the finest men the Nation ever produced. I said to him in a little conference in connection with the Army engineers: "You people by your action did this to my father." I was born and raised along the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and we looked upon that railroad with as big eyes as the youngster who goes down here and looks at an airplane now. We would go down on Sunday evenings to watch No. 49 come in. We would watch those big trains go by. They would not stop. This was when I was a boy. We would get carloads of lime and phosphate. We would haul our ties down there and put them on cars, and they would take them away. Later on, about 1920–30, the railroads themselves said, "We don't want that business." How did they do that? There was a distance of about 25 miles between a place called Rockwood, a small town, and another town called Confluence, and in that distance there were about seven stops and two flag stops, and these were little towns that got their goods by railroad.

The railroad had agents there to wait on them. The railroad took the agents away and took the service away. They stopped running the local freight that brought in the goods, the train that used to come down there every day. The local freight would come in and take a carload out, leave an empty car, and take away a carload of lime or phosphate or some other commodity. That was all done away with. They said by their action, "If you, Jeremiah Snyder"—my father's name—"if you want to get your phosphates, come up to Rockwood, 4 miles away, or to Confluence, 15 miles away. If you want to haul your pit props, since there are no sidetracks, haul them up to Rockwood or wherever you want." In other words, the railroads themselves took away the facilities.

I am strong for the railroads. I wanted to be an engineer when I was a boy. But when the trucks and the concrete ribbons got to taking away the business, then they began to cry and say, "My goodness, help us, help us lest we perish."

Sure; but they did not try to help themselves. As I said, for 25 years I did not see a single improvement in railroad equipment, except that they built bigger cars and bigger engines, more splendid ones. What I have reference to, however, is better service to serve these people. They were producing more commodities and more tonnage of all kinds in the farm district to which I have reference in 1930 than they were back in 1903–4–5–6, when I was a young fellow, but still they had much better facilities for transportation then by railroad, three, four, five, six times over, than they had in 1930. The railroads took away the facilities. I remember they got these boxes that they put cranes on and they put them on flat cars, and they would come to your town and drive up a truck and distribute the equipment.

Well, that does not serve. In other words, the railroads—and I am for them—are here to stay for a long, continuous haul for certain kinds of service, and we have to take care of these men. I am not for turning the railroads out now. I will vote for any bill which provides that if they do away with or consolidate the railroads, the railroad men above 50 years will have to be provided for by pension or in some other way. We dare not turn them out.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am a former railroad man myself.

Mr. SYNDER. Good.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that if some of the men were transferred to truck-driving service it would furnish a great deal of additional employment?

Mr. SNYDER. It would take care of a lot of them.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. This is so because a railroad with its big power uses a crew of five men to move a train of 110 cars, but to move the same amount by truck you would need more than 110 truck drivers.

Mr. SNYDER. A very good point.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin may I say that I have been told by railroad men who have engaged in the operation that it would take about 5 trucks to haul 1 carload of freight, so that instead of having 110 men it would take about 500 men.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I agree that it would take that many, but I aim to be conservative in my statements.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I can say that I railroaded also. Let us assume, now, that we substitute the gentleman's road scheme for the railroads, and we will say that, as our distinguished friend from Wisconsin has said, it would increase employment. Does the gentleman believe a man who has served until he is 50, 55, 60, or 65 years of age as a conductor on a railroad or as an engineer, a brakeman, a flagman, or in any other different line of mechanical work, would be competent to learn a new method of transportation and take over new methods of transporting goods?

Mr. SNYDER. Above a certain age, I would pension him. I would not ask him to do that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. I may say to the gentleman from Montana that I know a man above 50, a railroad conductor or engineer, and so forth, could not apply himself to a new kind of work, and I would make special provision when I voted for such a bill in the Congress that he be pensioned in a certain way or taken care of in some other way. If they are below that age, they can drive trucks and they can do other work along the highways. They can be watchmen or they can do a lot of things.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But the gentleman would not want to take a man out of employment when he was only 50 years old and give him a pension, because men dry up if they have nothing to do, and die as a result of idleness.

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. I do not believe we can stop the progress of this country. We are way behind now in building our superhighways, as the gentleman calls them, and I believe nothing can stop them. Conditions will adjust themselves; there is no question about it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield on this very point?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman correctly stated that if we do develop superhighways there are certain long-haul and heavy materials which will have to be hauled by the railroads.

Mr. SNYDER. That is it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And you will need these older men whom the gentleman talks about. If you can furnish jobs for the younger men under your program, if it is found feasible and we can find out where we are going to get the $8,000,000,000, you might furnish jobs for many former railroad men who cannot get a job at present. Men with 20 years' firing rights cannot even get a job on the firemen's extra list on most of the railroads today, even though they have been promoted as engineers for 18 years.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBBS. I am tremendously interested in the gentleman's remarks and in the program that he is fostering, and I notice on the map which the gentleman is exhibiting to us that the gentleman starts his southernmost east and west transcontinental route at about the north line of the State of Florida, and it runs parallel with the coast and very close to it until you strike Texas. I am wondering if it would not be a wiser plan and serve more people if you would raise that line, say, 100 miles or some such distance, so as to make your three east-and-west routes more nearly synchronous.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman's suggestion is very appropriate, and since I first drew this I have changed it, as the gentleman knows, several times, because I saw that the possibilities and the suggestions, such as the gentleman has made, may add to the fruitfulness of the program.

Mr. HOBBS. In other words, there is no one now living south of that line and, therefore, if you put it up 100 miles you would serve double the number of people.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; but I do want to answer this one question and that is about building roads through the cities. When you stop to think, you realize that our railroads were built where they are for only two or three reasons. First, they had to go along the stream level so they will be level enough to build, and then the towns sprung up because of the junction of some rivers coming into the valley or at some seaport, and that is why the cities sprung up where they are now. If you go to Baltimore or Boston or Philadelphia or New York or Pittsburgh or down in the valleys along these railroads, you will find they had to put their manufacturing establishments there in order to get their commodities on the railroads. Now, 60 or more percent of all these commodities are transported by trucks, and they have to get down into the cities and get these trucks out and, of course, at that time steam was the power that was used. Now, 70 percent of all the manufacturing that is carried on now is done with electricity. Therefore, if we build a road from here to Boston and do not go to Baltimore; do not go to Philadelphia; do not go to New York, but stay out of such places 10, 20, or 30 miles, factories that use electricity would spring up and be established along the roads and the home owners would multiply along these roads. Thousands that we are trying to take care of and get out of slum districts would go out along these routes and get homes somewhere near these factories, and that is not all.

Trucks that transport their goods would be right on the roads instead of coming up out of the hollows and getting on the roads. If these roads were completed today and put into operation, within 20 to 25 years there would be 10,000,000 of our people who would have built and be living on these highways.

Mr. O'CONNOR.. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Did the gentleman have any particular purpose in mind in omitting the State of Montana in connection with his plan?

Mr. SNYDER. No; I did not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The plan does not, however, include roads across the State of Montana.

Mr. SNYDER. We will have to look into that.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has demonstrated a very interesting plan of highway construction by Federal funds.

Mr. SNYDER. Perhaps Federal funds and perhaps not.

Mr. LUDLOW. Did the gentleman contemplate cooperation by the States and to what extent the States would benefit by these highways?

Mr. SNYDER. The best plan, I think, they could use in building would be the plan used by the Pennsylvania Turnpike Association. We could perhaps get $8,000,000,000 of gold out in Kentucky and build the roads on a toll plan and pay it back in from 40 to 50 years.

Mr. LUDLOW. Has the gentleman thought of the percentage of contribution by the States and the apportionment of the costs so that the States would share in the cost?

Mr. SNYDER. My present thought during the last 2 years, as I said in the beginning, is to have the roads built so that they would be self-liquidating in from 20 to 30 to 40 years.

Mr. KELLER. But as a matter of fact, the plan the gentleman is suggesting is necessarily merely suggestive rather than real, and it will be necessary to have the whole matter carefully surveyed before there could be a real plan?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; and I am very glad the gentleman has made that observation.

Mr. KELLER. Oh, I had done this work 20 years ago.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; I was about to comment upon the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois put in a somewhat similar plan about 20 years ago.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. As a matter of building these separate highways, would they not effect great economies in lifting loads over those hills and mountains, and would it not be a great saving in gasoline, and might we not need to save gasoline for future generations?

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman was not in the room when I explained before about the situation in Pennsylvania where, by the construction of the turnpike from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg, we will be able to save money and time.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. And it would increase employment of people now engaged in the railroad business. In the railroads they have a slogan of 1,000 tons per man. I used to be a conductor myself. In a truck this would mean five men and 5,000 tons, and with the trucks now it is impossible to move those loads.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made this afternoon in relation to an amendment which I offered, which was adopted, to the stream-pollution bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMITTING UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION TO ACQUIRE CERTAIN LANDS AT ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 424, to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to acquire certain lands at St. Petersburg, Fla., with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. As I understand it, the gentleman has taken this matter up with the minority members of the committee?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Yes; with the ranking minority member. I have permission to bring it up. The committee is familiar with it. I explained the amendment to him. I have his permission to bring it up, likewise the permission of the chairman of the committee. The amendment is just a technical amendment. It is a purely technical description to take care of a typographical error.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. How much money will this cost our almost bankrupt Federal Treasury?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. This is one case in which we are actually making the Government a gift. It is to correct the description of the property which we are to give.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out "4" and insert "6."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include a very brief editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRINGTON). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER] I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE WHEELER-LEA BILL

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes regarding the transportation bill, known as the Wheeler-Lea bill, S. 2009.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I am greatly interested in the railroad problem and the welfare of our great rail transportation system, as all Members are.

I am also interested, of course, in the welfare of the employees of the railroads and, of course, the welfare of our other transportation systems and the Nation in general.

A few days ago I made some remarks in the House regarding the effect which the adoption of S. 2009 by the Congress will have on the Railroad Retirement Act. In that statement I called attention to the fact that unless we retain the Harrington amendment in this transportation bill it is very likely to completely bankrupt or badly disrupt the Railroad Retirement Act because of the fact that under that act when originally put on the statute books it was presumed we would have an annual pay roll of approximately $2,200,000,000 for about 1,000,000 railroad employees on the pay roll, which was approximately the number on the pay roll at the time of the adoption of the act.

Along that line I want to read two paragraphs from some testimony of Mr. George M. Harrison, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association, who appeared on behalf of the Committee of Six appointed September 20, 1938, by the President of the United States to submit recommendations upon the general transportation system. These are taken from volume 1 of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House of Representatives, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, on the bill H. R. 2531, in January, February, and March 1939.

The question was asked by Mr. Martin:

When reorganizations or consolidations are effected, does it have the same effect of reduction in the management itself, officials, or supervisory personnel as it does with the employees? How is that taken care of?

I might point out here that in connection with my remarks the other day I also mentioned that if we let out 350,000 railroad employees, as is predicted by President Whitney, of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, as will happen if we adopt S. 2009 without the Harrington amendment, it would not only bring down the number of employees and thus cut down the annual pay roll but that it will leave in employment the older employees, who will thus be in a greater percentage as to the whole, and would thus make a still greater drain on the funds of the railroad retirement pension, as there would be more retiring, proportionately speaking.

The answer which Mr. Harrison gives to this question by Mr. Martin is as follows, and proves exactly the point which I made the other day. Here is Mr. Harrison's answer:

Well, here is about the way it generally works: Most of our supervisory and management staff members have been promoted from the ranks. They retain their rights to the classified service while they are so occupied; and should they discontinue a position of one of those persons, they would then slide back, or go back, I should say, to the classified service. Generally, however, they find some other employment in the managerial staff; and there is not, generally speaking, the same reduction in the official family—as we workers call it—as there is in the classified service when those changes take place. They generally put them out to doing something else. If you merge two freight stations and they only need one agent, they would probably give the other agent a job as a traffic solicitor or something like that. If you merge two offices and you had two superintendents, they will probably give the other superintendent a job as an assistant superintendent. If they do not have one, they probably would create one for him. That is about the way it works out. Now there are exceptions to every rule, but that has been my experience.

It bears out the point which I made—that there will be a still greater drain than the mere reduction in numbers in employment and pay roll on the Railroad Retirement Act.

Now, there is also another interesting item arising at this time in this connection which I wish to call attention to this afternoon.

The opponents of the Harrington amendment, finding themselves without a logical argument against its inclusion in the omnibus transportation bill, are now resorting, among other things, to a distortion of the facts. They are endeavoring to becloud the real issue by seeking to prejudice the Congress against the amendment by attempting to lead the Members to believe that the labor organizations have broken faith with the railroad managements. They are calling attention to certain facts and basing their contention thereon, without giving you all of the facts, which, when known, must entirely change your conclusions. It is my desire to make the whole matter clear.

They are telling you of an agreement entered into in May 1936 between the 21 standard railroad labor organizations and representatives of a large number of the carriers. This agreement is generally referred to as the Washington jobs agreement, by which those railroads signatory thereto have agreed to pay to employees displaced because of coordinations, unifications, and consolidations, 60 percent of their wages for a limited time. Such compensation is for varying periods of time, starting with 60 percent of their salary for a period of 6 months for those employees with more than 1 year and less than 2 years' service, and graduating upward until all displaced employees with 15 or more years' service are to receive 60 percent of their wages for 60 months. Sixty months is the maximum, and, regardless of the length of service being more than 15 years, they are limited to 60 percent of their wages for 60 months.

The opponents of the Harrington amendment are contending that because of this agreement the railroad employees should not now ask Congress to incorporate such an amendment in the omnibus transportation bill. They are claiming that while this so-called Washington jobs agreement is in effect the representatives of the employees are honor bound to refrain from attempting to protect their membership to any greater extent than is embodied in the agreement.

For more than 50 years the railroad labor organizations have been entering into contracts with the various railroad managements; for almost as long they have been coming before the Congress and the various State legislatures asking for legislation affecting their employment; but now for the first time we find those speaking in behalf of the railroad interests contending that because of an agreement having been entered into they are now breaking faith when they are asking for legislation on the same subject matter; and notwithstanding the further fact that such a move is made necessary because of the railroad interests' own attempt to get new legislation on the statute books by passage of S. 2009.

You will understand that in none of these agreements, including the so-called Washington jobs agreement, is there any restriction on either party from exercising his rights as a citizen to endeavor to have enacted legislation which will be beneficial to those they represent.

Those speaking for the opponents of the Harrington amendment seem to have forgotten that Congress enacted the so-called 8-hour-day law at a time when practically every one of these railroad labor organizations had contracts with the carriers providing for a 10- or 12-hour day; and few, if any, had contracts providing for an 8-hour day.

Those of you who were in Congress at that time will recall that there was no contention then that the representatives of railroad labor were breaking faith and that the 8-hour law should not be passed because of those agreements providing for 10- and 12-hour days.

It is well known by most, if not all, of you that the railroad brotherhoods are, from year to year, having introduced in State legislatures bills which give greater advantage to their membership than the contracts which they have entered into with the managements. In more than half of the States there are full-crew laws of one type or another which were enacted providing for additional men on certain trains. These laws were enacted at a time when the railroad labor organizations had contracts with many railroads providing that a lesser number of men would be required on those particular trains.

We all know that contracts must of necessity only provide for those things upon which the minds of both parties meet and do not in any way indicate that the contract as signed is entirely satisfactory to either party or that the signing of a contract with reference to a certain matter is any indication that those signing the contract agree that the contingency to which a contract refers and controls is a necessity or even desirable. Because I contract with an insurance company to indemnify me in case of loss from a tornado does not mean that I favor tornadoes. The principle is plainly demonstrated by the statement of President A. F. Whitney, of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, in the July 1936 issue of the Railroad Trainmen, the official publication of that organization, in which he said with reference to the Washington jobs agreement of May 21, 1936, immediately following the signing of that agreement:

> I want to emphasize that so far as the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen is concerned, the agreement with the carriers relative to consolidation and coordination can in no sense be interpreted to mean that the way is clear for railroad consolidation and coordination. This brotherhood will continue to fight as vigorously as it always has such efforts to economize at the expense of humanity. * * * We have now entered into an agreement with the carriers, designed, not to improve the standards of living or working conditions of railroad workers, but to share with them a small portion of the booty that would come to the coupon clippers if Wall Street's demand for "economy" at the expense of humanity is carried out.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to recognition.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Until the so-called Washington jobs agreement was signed in May 1936, there was no general agreement between any of the railroads and the representatives of railroad labor which would in any way compensate displaced employees when consolidations, coordinations, and so forth, were brought about. Therefore, while the representatives of railroad labor realizing that this agreement fell far short of protecting the interests of those they represented, it was, after all, something, where heretofore, they had had nothing, and was signed by representatives of many, if not all of those organizations, only because it was the best agreement they could persuade the representatives of the railroads to sign. There was no thought that this agreement was any different than any previous agreement entered into between them and the railroad managements, with respect to seeking further protection for their members.

Certainly, had it been in the minds of either party that by signing this agreement they were obligating themselves not to seek desirable legislation on that or any other subject, that fact would have been set forth in the agreement. But even so, it would be unconstitutional for any group of citizens to attempt so to sign away their civic rights to petition their Government, and this Congress could not well respect such an undemocratic agreement. Therefore, I say to you, those who are now attempting to make such a preposterous interpretation of the so-called Washington jobs agreement are laboring under a delusion that has no foundation in fact, in justice, or in law, and are doing so only because they have no reasonable grounds for their opposition to the Harrington amendment, and because they well know that no argument they have so far advanced is sufficient reason for its elimination from the bill.

The opponents of the Harrington amendment are also contending that the provisions of the amendment are unenforceable and unworkable, and yet these are the same people, mind you, who are calling your attention to the similar Washington jobs agreement.

If the Washington jobs agreement is workable and enforceable, why is not the Harrington amendment? They differ only in degree. Therefore the signing of the Washington jobs agreement by the representatives of the railroads indicates that the Harrington amendment is workable and enforceable, and that the principle of protecting jobs in railroad consolidations is just and reasonable.

President Daniel Willard, of the B. & O. Railroad, and others, have said that 80 percent of the savings from railroad consolidations come from savings in labor costs. Therefore, consolidations entered into under a law containing the provisions of the Harrington amendment will permit an immediate saving of 20 percent of the present cost of operation which is derived from sources other than labor. As the number of those employed upon the railroads at the time of consolidation is reduced from 7 to 10 percent, as it is, each year by men resigning, going on retirement, and so forth, the salary paid to that 7 to 10 percent will then divert to the holders of railroad securities. After a period of 10 or 12 years the full savings brought about by consolidation will be enjoyed by the holders of railroad securities. The railroad employees, whose ranks have already been depleted more than 50 percent since 1920 and who are in no way at fault for the present financial condition of our railroads, will not have taken from them their property rights to an opportunity to earn a livelihood which is rightly theirs because of many years' service upon the railroads. They will not be thrown into the bread lines of our country and be added to the millions who are now seeking employment. The solvency of the Railroad Retirement Act will not be jeopardized by having removed a large part of the pay rolls that sustain the act, thereby upsetting the basis upon which was based the present tax rate to provide for railroad retirement insurance as I explained at the start.

It is because of these reasons which I have pointed out that I call upon each and every one of you to insist upon the Harrington amendment being incorporated in any law enacted by this Congress which in any way changes the present law with regard to consolidations. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a very scholarly address delivered by a former Member of this House and also a Member of the United States Senate, former Senator Hawes, of Missouri, at the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary celebration of the founding of Bourbon County, Ky., last September, and to include also an address delivered on the same occasion by Hon. Cassius M. Clay, counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

S. E. C. SHOULD ENFORCE HOLDING COMPANY ACT—EVERY CITY SHOULD OWN ITS ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER SYSTEM

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call upon the members of the Securities and Exchange Commission to exercise the authority under the laws which we passed several years ago giving them the power to break up the large utility holding companies that were then, and are now, making a veritable racket out of the electric light and power business.

The Associated Gas & Electric Co. is a fair sample. If the S. E. C. will squeeze the water out of these gigantic concerns, eliminate the waste, graft, and extravagance and break them up as the law provides, they can reduce electric light and power rates and save the consumers of electricity in this country hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

The time has come for the Securities and Exchange Commission to carry out the law passed by Congress and to break up these large holding companies that are now urging them to postpone the day of reckoning, while they continue to fleece the investing public and suck the economic lifeblood out of the electric consumers.

By breaking up these vast holding companies they can render their subsidiaries amenable to State laws. Then if they want them dissolved, as many of them should be, the various distribution systems can be sold back to the municipalities and cooperative associations throughout the areas involved. They can then reduce electric light and power rates to the T. V. A. level and in that way save the people millions, if not hundreds of millions, of dollars every year that rolls around. I know it has been charged that the rates in the Tennessee Valley area, or what we know as the T. V. A. rate, are too low. I want to show in the course of my remarks that municipalities throughout the whole country can produce and distribute electricity at rates below the T. V. A. yardstick levels.

T. V. A. GREAT BLESSING

The T. V. A. is the greatest blessing that ever came to the electric consumers of this country, the ones who pay the bills. It is teaching them what electricity is worth—what it should cost them. It has been the greatest force of all in compelling reductions in light and power rates throughout the country by $583,000,000 a year, and it will aid us still more in bringing rates down to their proper levels, which will mean a further reduction of $1,000,000,000 a year. I will prove to you that the T. V. A. rates are not too low.

ILLINOIS—SPRINGFIELD

Since there has been so much said about Abraham Lincoln recently, I am going to begin with Springfield, Ill., the home town of that illustrious man who lived there three-quarters of a century ago.

Springfield, Ill., owns a municipal plant and distribution system. Springfield is a city of 89,000 people. Its plant and distribution system are valued at $4,392,162, on which it owes $1,385,000—it has been paid down to that figure out of its revenues.

In 1938 that system generated and distributed 60,067,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity, at an average rate of 1.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, whereas the T. V. A. yardstick distributes power at an average of 1.4 cents a kilowatt-hour.

Springfield sold this electricity for $925,294, its operating expenses amounted to $546,279, and it made a gross annual profit of $379,015. If it had given this $379,000 back to the ultimate consumers in the way of reduced rates, it could have sold its electricity below the T. V. A. yardstick rates. The same thing could be done in every other community in Illinois.

OHIO

Let us now turn to the great State of Ohio, where we are threatened with an epidemic of Republican candidates for the nomination for President, and see what is taking place in that State. The city of Cleveland owns its electric plant and distribution system. Cleveland is one of the large cities of the country, with a population of 918,000 people. It owns a municipal plant valued at $18,367,000, which has been paid down to $2,138,000 out of its revenues. In 1938 they generated 185,201,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity, which was sold to the ultimate consumers in Cleveland at an average of 1.9 cents per kilowatt-hour. The operating expenses were $1,972,000, leaving a gross annual profit of $1,624,000. If this gross annual profit had been given back to the ultimate consumers in the way of reduced rates, their electricity would have cost them less than the consumers in the Tennessee Valley pay under the T. V. A. yardstick rates.

Let us take the city of Columbus, the capital of Ohio, with 325,000 people. Columbus has a public plant and system valued at $1,870,000, which it paid down to $442,000 out of its revenues. In 1938 that system generated and distributed 57,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity which it sold to the ultimate consumers for $695,268, or at an average rate of 1.2 cents per kilowatt-hour, which is 2 mills less than the average retail rate in the T. V. A. area; yet the city of Columbus, with an operating expense of $409,399, made a gross annual profit of $285,869. If this profit has gone back to the consumers in Columbus, as is done in the T. V. A. area, they could have reduced the electric rates to the ultimate consumers to around 7 or 8 mills per kilowatt hour, or far below the T. V. A. rates.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is that electricity generated by the municipal plant in Columbus, Ohio, generated in a hydroelectric plant or steam plant?

Mr. RANKIN. In a steam plant.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Then the figures which the gentleman has presented clearly indicate that the local communities can operate electric generating plants far cheaper than the New Deal bureaucrats who are on the Federal Government pay roll in Washington.

Mr. RANKIN. No; but far cheaper than the Power Trust is charging the people of Wisconsin for electricity—in the gentleman's own State.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Due to that fact, the gentleman should be willing, I take it, to support legislation which will take Uncle Sam out of the electric-generating business and let the local interests generate electricity in accordance with the States' rights principles of government?

WISCONSIN

Mr. RANKIN. The Power Trust is not interested in States rights. That issue is not involved. The American people are being overcharged $1,000,000,000 a year for electric lights and power, and over $20,000,000 of that amount is being wrung from the helpless consumers of Wisconsin every year that rolls around.

Here is a city in Wisconsin that has a public power system, the city of Manitowoc. Let us examine it.

Manitowoc, which has a population of 26,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $1,704,601, on which it owes nothing, having paid for it out of the revenues.

In 1938 it generated and sold 21,050,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $362,406, or an average of 1.7 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $169,672, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $192,734.

If instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Manitowoc was 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is about half the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Wisconsin. The average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Manitowoc for all the electricity he used was only 2.4 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute bulletin.

If all the people of Wisconsin got their electricity at these Manitowoc rates, they would save anywhere from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year.

WINNIPEG, CANADA

The firm of Burns & McDonald, consulting engineers, of Kansas City, Mo., has published a small book on municipal lighting plants that everyone who is interested in this subject ought to read. It contains reports on 717 municipal light and power systems.

Now, let us take a look at Winnipeg, Canada, just over the line, and see what their rates are under public ownership.

The city of Winnipeg, in the Province of Manitoba, Canada, which has a population of 222,454, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $27,807,910, on which it owes $12,106,271.

In 1938 it generated and sold 580,274,805 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $3,160,061, or an average of 6 mills a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $1,185,892, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $1,974,169.

These rates are far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Winnipeg was 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is far below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the United States. The average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Winnipeg for all the electricity he used was only 8 mills a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the United States for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

People in Winnipeg have been heating their houses with electricity for 25 years, just as many are now doing in Tupelo and Corinth, Miss., and just as they will be doing in every State if we can stop this racketeering on the part of the utilities.

ONTARIO

Now let us examine some of the rates in Ontario. Here are two splendid examples.

The city of Fort William, Ontario, with a population of 25,050, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $855,694 on which it owes $184,760.

In 1938 it generated and sold 46,889,720 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $347,704, or an average of 7 mills a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $312,762, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $34,942.

These rates are far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumer in Fort William was only 1.89 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is less than one-third the average maximum rate charged by private power companies throughout the United States. The average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Fort William for all the electricity he used was only 6 mills a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the United States for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

Many people in Fort William are heating their houses with electricity. It is the best and cleanest heat to be had.

The city of Port Arthur, Ontario, Canada, which has a population of 21,449, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $1,795,480, on which it owes $10,808.

In 1938 it generated and sold 169,675,791 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $822,682, or an average of 5 mills a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $837,329, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $14,647.

These rates are far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumer in Port Arthur was only 1.8 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is less than one-third the average maximum rate charged by private power companies throughout the United States. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Port Arthur for all the electricity he used was only 9 mills a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the United States for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

Similar conditions and similar rates prevail throughout the entire Province of Ontario, just as they will throughout this country when the people wake up and demand them.

If the people of Wisconsin got their electricity at the Winnipeg rates, or the Ontario rates, they would save about $25,000,000 a year.

INDIANA

Now let us turn to the State of Indiana, and take the city of Richmond, where they have a public plant and system owned and operated by the municipality.

Richmond is a city of 33,000 people, and it has a plant valued at $4,000,000, which it has paid for out of the revenues. In 1938 it generated 42,150,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity, which were sold for $778,313, or at an average of 1.8

cents per kilowatt-hour. The operating expenses were $293,566, and it made a gross annual profit of $484,747.

If this overcharge, or gross annual profit, had gone back to the ultimate consumers in Richmond, their electric rates could have been reduced far below the T. V. A. yardstick levels.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is that a steam plant?

Mr. RANKIN. It is a steam plant; yes. Let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that you can generate power anywhere in the United States with water power, with gas, with oil, or with coal, and sell it at the T. V. A. yardstick rates and yield a reasonable return on legitimate investments.

Yet, as I said, the people of Wisconsin are overcharged $20,000,000 for their electricity and the people of Indiana, outside of Richmond, are overcharged $24,000,000 a year.

KANSAS

In Kansas City, Kans., a city of 130,000 people, they have a public plant and system valued at a little more than $10,000,000. In 1938 they distributed and sold power to the amount of $2,266,000, at an average of 1.4 cents per kilowatt-hour, just exactly the average sale and distribution rates in the T. V. A. area; while at the same time their operating expenses were $1,323,000, giving them a gross annual profit of $943,000, which they could have turned back into the pockets of the consumers, reducing their rates far below the T. V. A. yardstick levels.

Yet the people of the State of Kansas, outside of Kansas City, are overcharged more than $10,000,000 a year for their electricity.

CALIFORNIA

I find here in the cities of Los Angeles and Pasadena, Calif., the same conditions prevail.

The city of Los Angeles, which has a population of 1,530,000, owns and operates its electric-light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $181,587,984 on which it owes $107,362,076.

It buys its power from Boulder Dam.

In 1938 it distributed and sold 1,294,611,632 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $25,555,032, or an average of 2 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $11,731,321, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $13,823,711.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Los Angeles was 4.4 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is far below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of California. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Los Angeles for all the electricity he used was only 3.1 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

The people of California, outside of Los Angeles and Pasadena, are overcharged more than $32,000,000 a year for their electric lights and power.

Now let us look at Pasadena.

The city of Pasadena, Calif., which has a population of 80,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $9,912,176, on which it owes $176,673.

In 1938 it generated and sold 83,084,573 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $1,580,023, or an average of 1.9 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $850,643, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $729,380.

If instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

Yet the maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Pasadena was 4.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of California. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Pasadena for all the electricity he used was only 3.2 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I should like to remark that the city of Pasadena has an amendment in its charter—and I refer to it because it is my home city—which provides for the payment into the general fund of the city of 8 percent of the gross revenues every year, which sum is used for paying the interest and principal on the city's bonded debt.

Mr. RANKIN. In lieu of taxes?

Mr. HINSHAW. Partially in lieu of taxes.

Mr. RANKIN. There was paid into the city treasury in lieu of taxes in 1938 the sum of $124,551, which carries out the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HINSHAW. That has been approved by the State legislature. I should like to remark also to the gentleman that the citizens of Pasadena, through their light bills, have paid for their plant themselves and they did not get a dime from anybody else.

Mr. RANKIN. That is exactly the point I am making, that if they will break these big holding companies up and sell these properties back to the people in those cities or to the cooperative associations in those areas, they can pay for them out of the revenues and at the same time get their electricity below the T. V. A. rates.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the gentleman propose that the people of the Tennessee Valley shall repay the Government for the building of the T. V. A. facilities?

Mr. RANKIN. They are already doing it.

Mr. HINSHAW. To what extent?

Mr. RANKIN. Every dollar of it at the present rate we are paying for wholesale power. We are paying a great deal more for wholesale power than the city of Pasadena is paying for the wholesale power it buys from one of those irrigation projects.

Mr. HINSHAW. We do not buy any power from irrigation projects. We do not even have to buy it from Boulder Dam. We can generate it cheaper than we can buy it.

Mr. RANKIN. We are paying more than Los Angeles is paying for Boulder Dam power, and at the rate we are going at the present time, in 30 years we will pay every dollar that is charged to power and in 50 years we will get back every dollar spent on the T. V. A., including that spent for navigation and flood control.

Mr. HINSHAW. Would the gentleman be willing to support the bill, that we hope will come before the House a little later, to knock $25,000,000 off the cost of Boulder Dam, for flood-control purposes, in view of the fact that T. V. A. is very largely flood control?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes. I have supported it before. I see no reason why the power consumers should be required to pay for flood control, either on the Colorado River or the Tennessee.

What I am driving at is getting electricity to every human being in America at what it is worth, and I shall be pleased to support an amendment of that kind.

Mr. HINSHAW. May I answer the gentleman that every human being in the city of Pasadena and vicinity has electric lights?

Mr. RANKIN. I congratulate this city on the progress it is making.

Mr. HINSHAW. Also, all the farmers in my district have power available, if they want it, right at their front doors.

Mr. RANKIN. That is fine; I know they want it.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I am always interested in anything the gentleman from Mississippi has to say with reference to electric power, because I consider him the authority in this country on this important subject. I should like to know if the gentleman has any data that would show how much Pennsylvania is paying for power, compared with Mississippi, and whether the gentleman would insert that in the RECORD.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will come to Pennsylvania in just a moment.

FLORIDA

But first I want to refer to the city of Jacksonville, Fla. Jacksonville buys its fuel and hauls it long distances, probably from Oklahoma or Louisiana or Texas, or maybe from California. Jacksonville is a city of 140,000 people. They have a plant valued at $13,876,890, and it has been paid down to $4,439,500 out of the revenues. In 1938 they generated and distributed 138,415,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $3,494,608, or an average of 2½ cents a kilowatt hour. But out of that $3,494,608 they paid operating expenses of $1,266,527 and made a gross annual profit of $2,228,081. If they had given that $2,228,081 back to the consumers of electricity in reduced rates, they could have reduced them far below the T. V. A. yardstick levels. The same thing could be done all over the State. Yet the people of Florida are overcharged more than $15,000,000 for their electricity.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the gentleman realize that it is a fact—which I can prove from my own experience in my own district—that it is cheaper to transmit power by hauling it in a railroad car or a steamboat than it is to transmit it by high-tension lines? We can haul power up from Long Beach in oil a lot cheaper than we can transmit it over the transmission lines.

Mr. RANKIN. No; the gentleman from California is wrong about that.

PENNSYLVANIA

Now, let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER] that I have here one of the outstanding municipal plants in the State of Pennsylvania—Chambersburg.

The city of Chambersburg, Pa., which has a population of 14,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $509,540 on which it owes nothing. It has been paid for out of the revenues.

In 1938 it generated and sold 10,716,870 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $289,837, or an average of 2.7 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $76,701, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $213,136.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The same thing could be done all over Pennsylvania, yet the people of that State are overcharged more than $72,000,000 for their electricity.

NEW YORK

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to a few more instances, and then I am going to close. I selected this time because I thought that I would not be greatly disturbed. I have not been disappointed.

Let us turn to the State of New York and take the city of Jamestown. The people of the State of New York pay overcharges of from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 a year for electricity. We have seen the Power Trust gobble up the power on the Niagara River, and already we see them opposing the development of power on the St. Lawrence. Why? Because they are not only taking from the people of New York almost $200,000,000 a year in overcharges but they are holding their rates so high that the people in New York cannot use enough electricity to enjoy it. They are only using around 60 kilowatts a month. We have towns in my district that use an average of 193 kilowatts a month. In New York they only have a saturation of 48 percent of electric refrigerators, whereas in my home town of Tupelo, Miss., it is 90 percent; and the same thing is true in Corinth.

Jamestown, N. Y., has a population of 48,000 people. What can be done in Jamestown can be done in New York City and in all the other cities in the State of New York. Let us see what Jamestown has accomplished. They have a plant valued at $4,580,614. It has been in operation for 47 years. They owe only $70,000 for money that they borrowed at times for extensions. In 1938 they generated 51,085,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity and sold it for $842,000, or an average of 1.6 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is less than they sold it for in Pasadena. Operating expenses amounted to $615,000, and they made a gross annual profit of $227,545. If they had given the consumers in Jamestown the benefit of that reduction, they could have sold electricity much cheaper than we are selling it in the Tennessee Valley area or in Los Angeles, Calif., or in Tacoma, Wash.

Here are some other splendid examples of municipal ownership of electric facilities.

ALABAMA

The city of Florence, Ala., which has a population of 14,427, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $284,489, on which it owes $188,917.

It buys its power wholesale from the T. V. A. at 4.33 mills per kilowatt-hour.

In 1938 it distributed 10,954,995 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $176,948, or an average of 1.6 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $88,693, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross anual profit of $88,255.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Florence was 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Alabama. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Florence for all the electricity he used was only 1.9 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

Remember that 7 years ago the Alabama Power Co. was buying this same power at Muscle Shoals at less than 2 mills a kilowatt-hour and was selling it to the domestic consumers in Florence at 10 cents a kilowatt-hour and taking all the profits.

If all the electric consumers in Alabama received their lights and power at the Florence rates, they would save more than $7,000,000 a year. That could be done in every community in that State if the people could own and control their electric facilities.

COLORADO

The city of Colorado Springs, Colo., which has a population of 40,500, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $3,880,065, on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold 32,386,760 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $806,572, or an average of 2.5 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $275,617, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $530,955.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rates to the domestic consumers in Colorado Springs were 5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Colorado. And the average paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Colorado Springs for all the electricity he used was only 3.9 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

Remember the people of Colorado are overcharged more than $8,000,000 a year for their electricity.

GEORGIA

The city of Cordele, Ga., which has a population of 18,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $2,000,000, on which it owes $1,008,000.

In 1938 it generated and sold 22,447,225 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $194,538, or an average of 0.9 cent a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $52,623, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $141,915.

If instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it in to the city treasury it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Cordele was 4.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Georgia. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Cordele for all the electricity he used was only 3.8 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

The people of Georgia are overcharged more than $11,000,000 a year for their electricity, which could be saved if they owned and controlled their electric facilities.

IDAHO

The city of Bonners Ferry, Idaho, which has a population of 1,500, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $125,000, on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold 2,143,200 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $40,150, or an average of 1.9 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $20,130, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $20,020.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Bonners Ferry was 5.85 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Idaho. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Bonners Ferry for all the electricity he used was only 2.1 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin, or about half the national average.

The people of Idaho could save their overcharges of $3,500,000 by owning and operating their electric facilities.

IOWA

The city of Atlantic, Iowa, which has a population of 6,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $427,230, on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold 4,744,150 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $98,036, or an average of 2.1 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $67,472, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $30,564.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it in to the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Atlantic was 5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Iowa. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Atlantic for all the electricity he used was only 4.2 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

The city of Strawberry Point, Iowa, which has a population of 1,127, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $50,000 on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold 654,390 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $17,718, or an average of 2.7 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $9,344, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $8,374.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Strawberry Point was 5.4 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Iowa.

The people of Iowa are overcharged more than $14,000,000 a year for their electricity, which they could save by owning and operating their electric facilities.

MARYLAND

The city of Hagerstown, Md., which has a population of 33,280, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $1,537,541, on which it owes $325,000.

In 1938 it generated and sold 17,472,600 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $455,863, or an average of 2.6 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $161,021, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $294,842.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Hagerstown was 7 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is about the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Maryland. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Hagerstown for all the electricity he used was only 4.2 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

Although Maryland is rich in both coal and water power her people are overcharged more than $13,000,000 a year for their electricity, and yet much of the power used by them is generated at the Conowingo Dam and sold to private power interests for profit at 3.34 mills a kilowatt-hour, which is far below the T. V. A. wholesale rates. But by the time this power gets to the ultimate consumers in Maryland they pay overcharges to the amount of $13,000,000 a year.

MASSACHUSETTS

The city of Braintree, Mass., which has a population of 19,500, owns and operates its electric-light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $890,264, on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold 19,552,200 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $308,403, or an average of 1.6 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $247,589, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $60,814.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Braintree was 4.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Massachusetts. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Braintree for all the electricity he used was only 2.8 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

The people of Massachusetts are overcharged more than $44,000,000 a year for their electricity. That is the tribute the helpless consumers of electricity in Massachusetts pay to the Power Trust every year.

MICHIGAN

The city of Lansing, Mich., which has a population of 112,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $12,171,000 on which it owes $665,000.

In 1938 it generated and sold 115,392,818 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $2,240,484, or an average of 1.9 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $867,160, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $1,373,324.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Lansing was 5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Michigan. And, the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Lansing for all the electricity he used was only 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

The power consumers of Michigan are overcharged more than $40,000,000 for their electric lights and power according to the T. V. A. rates. Michigan adjoins the Province of Ontario and her people should enjoy the same electric rates as do the people of Ontario. If they did, they would save more than $47,000,000 a year. Ontario's rates are cheaper than those of the T. V. A.

MINNESOTA

The city of Moorhead, Minn., which has a population of 9,170, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $420,623 on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold electricity amounting to $146,743, or an average of 1.5 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $104,462, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $42,271.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Moorhead was 4.95 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Minnesota. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Moorhead for all the electricity he used was only 3.1 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

The people of Minnesota pay overcharges for electricity every year amounting to more than $16,000,000. Minnesota also joins Ontario, and her people should enjoy the Ontario rates; yet, according to the Ontario rates, the people of Minnesota are overcharged more than $19,000,000 a year.

MISSISSIPPI

Alcorn County (Miss.) Electric Power Association owns and operates its electric light and power system and buys its power wholesale from the T. V. A.

It has a distribution system valued at $328,000, on which it owes nothing, having paid for it out of the revenues in 5 years.

In 1938 it generated and sold 10,329 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $144,265, or an average of 1.4 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $87,719, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $56,546.

The maximum retail rates to the domestic consumers in Alcorn County were 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is far below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Mississippi. They have now been reduced to 2.5 cents. And the average paid by a domestic consumer in Alcorn County for all the electricity he used was only 1.7 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

This association paid $11,560 taxes, which is above the average paid by any private power company in Mississippi in a county the size of Alcorn.

The city of Greenwood, Miss., which has a population of 13,500, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $806,182, on which it owes $120,000.

In 1938 it generated and sold 11,660,500 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $255,439, or an average of 2.2 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $95,734, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $159,705.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Greenwood was 7 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is about the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Mississippi. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Greenwood for all the electricity he used was only 3.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

Greenwood has recently reduced her rates almost to the T. V. A. rates.

The city of Tupelo, Miss., which has a population of 7,500, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $243,819, on which it owes $67,916. It buys its power wholesale from the T. V. A.

In 1938 it generated and sold 9,269,100 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $131,091, or an average of 1.4 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $81,073, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $50,018.

It paid $10,015 taxes and still has $40,000 net profit left.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Tupelo was 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Mississippi. They have since been reduced to 2.5 cents. And the average paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Tupelo for all the electricity he used was only 1.7 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

Tupelo has now reduced its rates to a maximum of 2½ cents a kilowatt-hour to domestic and commercial consumers.

While the people in northeastern and north central Mississippi enjoy the T. V. A. rates, the people in the rest of the State are overcharged more than $4,000,000 for their lights and power—although private power companies buy their power wholesale delivered in Mississippi below the T. V. A. wholesale rates.

MISSOURI

The city of Hannibal, Mo., which has a population of 24,500, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $1,063,463, on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold 20,320,100 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $373,110, or an average of 1.8 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $169,872, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $203,238.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Hannibal was 5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Missouri. And the average paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Hannibal for all the electricity he used was only 3.9 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to the domestic consumers.

Hannibal's electric system paid taxes to the amount of $8,979, gave the city cash donations amounting to $62,856, and free services to the amount of $23,251. Yet the people of Missouri are overcharged $21,000,000 a year for their electricity.

NEBRASKA

The city of Fremont, Nebr., which has a population of 12,300, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $1,353,819, on which it owes nothing.

In 1938 it generated and sold 12,632,500 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $224,060, or an average of 1.8 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $196,246, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $27,814.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Fremont was 4.3 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Nebraska. And the average paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Fremont for all the electricity he used was only 2.9 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

The people of Nebraska pay overcharges for their electricity amounting to more than $7,000,000 a year.

OREGON

The city of Eugene, Oreg., which has a population of 22,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $4,321,964, on which it owes $554,000.

In 1938 it generated and sold 37,100,115 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $551,938, or an average of 1.5 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $272,743, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $279,195.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investment.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Eugene was 6 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Oregon. And the average paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Eugene for all the electricity he used was only 3.1 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

The overcharges in Oregon amount to more than $6,000,000 a year.

TENNESSEE

The city of Knoxville, Tenn., which has a population of 150,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system. It buys its power wholesale from the T. V. A.

It has a plant and system valued at $6,575,000, which it purchased in 1938.

In the 4 months it operated this system in 1938 it sold 13,753,669 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $160,444, or an average of 1.2 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $100,494, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $59,950.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Knoxville was 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is far below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Tennessee. And the average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Knoxville for all the electricity he used was only 2.1 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

TEXAS

The city of Austin, Tex., which has a population of 78,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $5,500,000 on which it owes nothing, having paid for it out of the revenues.

In 1938 it generated and sold 64,656,600 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $1,346,826, or an average of 2.1 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $427,542, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $919,284.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Austin was 6 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Texas. The average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Austin for all the electricity he used was 5.1 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

The people of Texas are overcharged more than $31,000,000 a year for electricity—in a State where there is enough natural gas going to waste to generate electricity enough to supply four or five States the size of Texas. It could be supplied to the people of Texas at less than the T. V. A. rates.

For instance, the Louisiana Power & Light Co. generates power, transmits it into Arkansas, and sells it wholesale to the Arkansas Power & Light Co. at 2.6 mills a kilowatt-hour, which is about half the T. V. A. wholesale rate. But by the time it gets to the people of Arkansas they pay overcharges that for the whole State amount to $5,600,000 a year; and the people of Louisiana are overcharged $9,000,000 a year.

VERMONT

Now, let us take a small town in far-away Vermont—one that has to get all its fuel from another State.

The town of Morrisville, Vt., which has a population of only 1,875, owns and operates its electric-light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $595,049, on which it owes $68,000.

The total operating expenses were $50,770, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $22,861.

Yet the maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Morrisville was 6 cents a kilowatt-hour which is below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Vermont. The average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Morrisville for all the electricity he used was only 2.8 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers.

VIRGINIA

The city of Danville, Va., which has a population of 30,000 owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $5,337,781 which it has paid down to $2,086,000 out of its revenues.

In 1938 it generated and sold 20,464,130 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $654,600, or an average of 3.2 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were only $206,873, which taken from the total revenues left a gross annual profit of $447,727, or more than two-thirds of the total revenues.

If, instead of collecting this overcharge and turning it into the city treasury, it had given it back to the consumers in rate reductions, these rates would have been reduced far below the T. V. A. yardstick rates, and the city would have made ample returns on its investments, and the consumers would have doubled their consumption and further increased the revenues and the profits.

Yet the maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Danville was 6 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is about the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Virginia, and is less than two-thirds the rates charged by private power companies 7 years ago, before the T. V. A. was created, and its yardstick rates published to the world. Thus it will be seen that the T. V. A. has helped to bring relief to the electric light and power consumers in every section of the country.

The people of Virginia are still overcharged $11,000,000 a year for their electric lights and power.

WASHINGTON

The city of Tacoma, Wash., which has a population of 112,000, owns and operates its electric light and power system.

It has a plant and system valued at $24,429,242, on which it owes $4,563,000.

In 1938 it generated and sold 348,119,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity for $2,473,735, or an average of 7 mills a kilowatt-hour.

The total operating expenses were $706,401, which, taken from the total revenues, left a gross annual profit of $1,767,334.

The maximum retail rate to the domestic consumers in Tacoma was 4.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, which is far, far below the average maximum rates charged by private power companies throughout the State of Washington. The average rate paid by a domestic consumer in the city of Tacoma for all the electricity he used was only 1.6 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with an average of 4.06 cents a kilowatt-hour charged by the private power companies throughout the country for all electricity sold to domestic consumers, as shown by the Edison Electric Institute Bulletin.

If we could get power to all the American people at the Tacoma rates, they would save $1,130,000,000 a year.

CONCLUSION

I could fill the RECORD with illustrations of this kind, but I feel that these are sufficient to prove to any unbiased mind that electricity can be generated and distributed to the ultimate consumers anywhere in the United States at the T. V. A. yardstick rates, which would save the people of this country a billion dollars a year on their light and power bills alone. [Applause.]

SENATE

MONDAY, MARCH 4, 1940

The Chaplain, Rev. Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, whose love for us is so constant that it passeth understanding, whose justice is wider than our mercy and whose purpose is greater than our prayer: We commit ourselves and our Nation to Thy holy keeping, for Thou knowest our frame, Thou rememberest that we are but dust; help us therefore to trust only in that forgiveness which needs not to forget.

We pray especially today that Thy choicest blessings may rest upon our President, who once again before Thy sanctuary has renewed his pledge of fealty and devotion to his country and his God. May he cast upon Thee all his cares and the overheavy burdens of his high and holy office, and may he set before his eyes Thy watchful eye and Thine uncorrupted judgment, that the people of America may find Thy way to be the way of holiness which leads to everlasting peace for all mankind. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Senate Joint Resolution 6

Relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to enact S. 2212, relating to the development of marketing and marketing services for farm commodities

Whereas the marketing of agricultural products is a matter of deep concern to the people of this State; and

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill designated S. 2212, to provide for the development of marketing and marketing services for farm commodities; and

Whereas said bill proposes to appropriate $5,000,000 to be apportioned to the several States for the purpose of organizing, fostering, promoting, and developing marketing and marketing services for farm commodities in order to provide a steady flow of standardized farm commodities to centers of distribution; and

Whereas the purposes of said bill are in all respects desirable and the enactment of said bill would be highly beneficial to the agricultural industry of this State as well as other States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby respectfully urges and memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to enact S. 2212 now pending in the Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate is hereby directed to send copies of this resolution to the President and the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Senate and the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States from California.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New York, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, February 26, 1940.

Whereas on September 17, 1796, George Washington, first President of the United States, delivered his farewell address to the American people; and

Whereas on that day the Father of our Country set down certain suggestions for the guidance of the American people; and

Whereas by his refusal to seek election for the third time he established a tradition that to this day has remained unbroken; and

Whereas in his farewell address President Washington said, "Friends and citizens, the period for a new election of a citizen to administer the Executive Government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprize you of the resolution that I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made;" and

Whereas this tradition of a President of the United States of not seeking election for a third term forms the one remaining bulwark protecting the people of this Nation against the threat of the establishment of a dictatorship; and

Whereas with the establishment of a dictatorship the minorities now accorded their rights under our Constitution will be swept aside and accorded the same treatment now given them in certain countries of Europe: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Congress of the United States be and hereby is memorialized to enact suitable legislation to prevent any President from seeking a third term, and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each Member of Congress from New York State.

By order of the senate,

IN ASSEMBLY, February 27, 1940.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order of the Assembly,

ANSLEY B. BORKOWSKI, Clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Perth Amboy Republicans, Perth Amboy, N. J., favoring the enactment of legislation to prevent any President of the United States from seeking a third term in the Presidential office, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Port Isabel-San Benito Navigation District, of Cameron County, Tex., favoring the retention of river and harbor work under the Corps of Engineers of the Army, War Department, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Industrial Traffic Managers Conference, Los Angeles, Calif., representing 137 major industrial concerns in southern California, relative to the problem of water transportation from Los Angeles Harbor to the Panama Canal Zone, especially in connection with the matter of the construction of new locks, barracks, airports, etc., for purposes of national defense in the Canal Zone, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Young Democrats of San Diego, Calif., opposing loans to foreign powers either for their own wars or in aid of the wars of other powers, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the enactment of pending legislation to assist the States in the improvement of highways, and also to authorize the Federal Government to acquire rights-of-way for road projects so as to help cities solve the problem of traffic congestion, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions of the C. & R. National Farm Loan Association, of Crockett, and the Western National Farm Loan Association, of Muleshoe, both in the State of Texas, favoring restoration of the Farm Credit Administration to the status of an independent bureau and the placing of the operations of the Federal land banks, national farm-loan associations, and other units of the Administration under the supervision of a bipartisan board appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which were referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ulysses, Kans., praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 517) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to prohibit the advertising of alcoholic beverages by radio, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOLT presented a paper in the nature of a petition from the Marion County Medical Society of West Virginia, favoring the enactment of legislation to establish a national department of health, the executive officer of which shall be a physician holding the degree of doctor of medicine and who shall be a member of the President's Cabinet as the Secretary of Health, which was referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club, protesting against the enforced 30-day furlough of relief workers, and favoring the appropriation of sufficient funds for work relief until a solution is found for the unemployment problem, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the League for Peace Action, of Stoneham, Mass., favoring further extension of the law providing for reciprocal-trade agreements with foreign nations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey and ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point, under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the United States Senate not to ratify the pending treaty with the Dominion of Canada for building the St. Lawrence seaway

Whereas there is out-spoken opposition on the part of the people of this State with the proposed treaty, pursuant to which a ship canal will be constructed along the St. Lawrence River under the joint auspices and joint expense of the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada; and

Whereas the treaty provides that the United States is to expend for its share the sum of over $250,000,000, and it has been estimated by reliable authorities that the actual cost will be from $712,000,000 to $1,350,000,000, of which the United States should bear its proportionate share; and

Whereas the cost of this canal would represent an added burden to taxpayers and would create an unregulated and subsidized means of transportation; and

Whereas the principal advantages would accrue to Canada rather than to the United States in the development of more ports and shipping facilities; and

Whereas the use of the proposed canal, which would be closed to navigation for 5 months of the year, would in no way justify the cost, it would nevertheless tend to take some shipping from the port of New York in which the State of New Jersey has a large interest; and

Whereas the record distinctly shows that the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway is intended to decrease the movement of traffic via United States rail lines, and, if successful, would be detrimental to our transportation system, its employees, and the public in general; be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of New Jersey (the house of assembly concurring): That the Senate of the United States, and particularly the Senators elected from New Jersey, be memorialized and requested to not ratify the treaty for the proposed St. Lawrence deep waterway; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Secretary of the United States Senate and to each Senator elected from the State of New Jersey.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. HARRISON] and myself, I present a resolution or memorial adopted unanimously by the Mississippi Legislature urging the Congress to restore the appropriation stricken out by the House of Representatives for the continuation of the program under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Purchase Act.

At the same time I present a resolution adopted by the Mississippi Farm Security Administration Advisory Committee to the same effect. I ask that both resolutions be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, because today in American agriculture the problem of farm tenancy is a very live one. In Mississippi alone 70 percent of the farmers are tenants and in the United States as a whole 50 percent of the farmers are tenants. The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry realizes, I think, the seriousness of the situation, and I believe the resolutions will be worth reading by Members of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be received, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 21

House concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to continue the program of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Purchase Act

Whereas the Bankhead-Jones Tenant Purchase Act has resulted in great benefits to the State of Mississippi during the last 3 years, giving to approximately 1,400 farm families the privilege of acquiring farm homes; and

Whereas this legislation points to the solution of one of the major agricultural problems in this region; and

Whereas this is a self-liquidating program, the elimination of which would not substantially affect the national budgetary problem: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi (the senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to make the appropriation recommended by the President to continue the program of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Purchase Act; and be it further

Resolved, That the program of rural habilitation now being conducted by the Farm Security Administration and under which 25,000 Mississippi farmers are being aided by small loans and technical guidance to become self-sufficient be encouraged by the Congress and measures adopted for its continuance on its present basis.

Whereas the House Committee on Appropriations removed from the agricultural appropriation bill the $25,000,000 proposed in the Budget for tenant purchase under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act; and

Whereas the State of Mississippi has a large percentage of tenant farmers who are eager to become home owners, evidenced by the fact that 24,000 applications for tenant purchase loans have been presented to the committees in the respective counties; and

Whereas the administration of the tenant purchase program in Mississippi and the purchasing and building of homes for worthy tenants have aroused sympathetic interest on the part of the public. Our people are favorably impressed with the fact that these tenants can become successful landowners: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Mississippi Farm Security Administration Advisory Committee, That in the interest of the thousands of worthy tenant farmers in the State, you use your influence and best efforts to have the $25,000,000 proposed in the Budget reinstated in the agricultural appropriation bill now pending in the Senate of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That the chairman of the Mississippi Farm Security Administration Advisory Committee, Mr. P. F. Williams, is hereby authorized and instructed to transmit copies of this resolution to the Senators and Congressmen from Mississippi.

And—

THE FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], and the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], I introduce a bill.

In connection with the bill, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter with reference to the bill which is addressed to me, signed by Mr. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and concurred in by vice presidents of the federation from Illinois, New York, New Hampshire, Vermont, Maryland, Minnesota, Kansas, Iowa, Indiana, Wyoming, Nevada, California, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, and Mississippi; a letter received on the same subject signed by representatives of the National Grange, the National Council of Farm Cooperatives, the National Wool Growers' Association, and the American National Livestock Association; and copies of resolutions adopted by these organizations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the matters submitted by the Senator from Iowa will be printed in the RECORD.

By Mr. GILLETTE (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. MILLER, Mr. MEAD, and Mr. TRUMAN): The bill (S. 3480) to provide for the establishment of the Farm Credit Administration as an independent agency of the Government, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization.

The letters and resolutions presented by Mr. GILLETTE are as follows:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1940.

Hon. GUY M. GILLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GILLETTE: Pursuant to a resolution of the twenty-first annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the board of directors has approved the following resolution with respect to the farm-credit system:

"For 25 years farmers have struggled to build up a sound, effective, permanent, and independent farm-credit system, including the Federal land banks, the intermediate credit banks, the banks for cooperatives, and the production credit system. The ultimate objective is complete farmer ownership and farmer control.

"This objective, we believe, can best be achieved by placing complete administrative responsibility in the hands of a board of governors, as an independent Government agency, members to be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, with terms of members so staggered as to insure continuity of administration.

"The federation will aggressively support legislation directed toward this objective."

The attached bill carries out this resolution and has the approval of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

We hope this bill will meet with your approval. We respectfully urge your active support in obtaining its enactment into law at this session of Congress.

Respectfully yours,

EDW. A. O'NEAL, President.

P. S.—The foregoing communication has been concurred in by the following members of the board of directors and their names have been authorized to be appended to this letter:

Earl C. Smith, Illinois, vice president; H. P. King, New York; George M. Putnam, New Hampshire, Arthur Packard, Vermont; H. H. Nuttle, Maryland; Frank W. White, Minnesota; O. O. Wolf, Kansas; Francis Johnson, Iowa; Hassil E. Schenck, Indiana; H. J. King, Wyoming; George Ogilvie, Nevada; George H. Wilson, California; J. F. Porter, Tennessee; Ben Kilgore, Kentucky; R. E. Short, Arkansas; Ransom Aldrich, Mississippi; Mrs. H. W. Ahart, California; R. W. Blackburn, secretary and treasurer.

RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE ON THE FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION ADOPTED AT PEORIA, ILL., NOVEMBER 15–23, 1939

Whereas the Grange has had a consistent policy of many years' standing favoring a cooperative credit system under an independent bipartisan board: Therefore be it

Resolved, First, that the National Grange favors the establishment of the Farm Credit Administration as an independent agency operating under the supervision of a bipartisan board appointed for staggered terms of office.

Second: That such agency have supervision of the Federal Farm Loan System, the Production Credit System, the banks for cooperatives, the Intermediate Credit Bank System, and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.

Third: That the cooperative features of the Federal Land Bank System, the Production Credit System, and the banks for cooperatives be preserved and strengthened and means be devised for establishing the intermediate credit banks on a cooperative basis.

Fourth: That the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation be continued as an emergency lending agency until agriculture can be established on such basis that emergency credit of this character is no longer needed.

Such a policy is important to agriculture for the following reasons:

(a) A dependable source of credit adapted to the borrowers' needs and paying capacity is essential to a successful agriculture.

(b) Consistent continuity of policy and sound management are necessary if funds are to be available on favorable interest rates and terms. This cannot be accomplished if the policy and management are subject to sudden changes. Borrowers, employees, and investors alike must be freed from political uncertainties or pressure if maximum safety and service are to be attained. This can be accomplished only by providing supervision by a bipartisan board serving for staggered terms if sufficient safety and service are to be attained. This can be accomplished only by providing supervision by a bipartisan board serving for staggered terms of sufficient length to prevent sudden changes in fundamental administrative policies.

(c) The credit service should provide not only long-term capital, short-term production credit, and cooperative marketing credit, as are now provided by the Federal land banks, the Production Credit System, the banks for cooperatives, and intermediate credit banks, but until agriculture has sufficiently recovered from the many years of depression to operate on a normal basis, emergency credit similar to that available through the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation will be needed. Since the power of this Corporation to make loans expires on January 31, 1940, it is essential that it be extended for a reasonable period.

(d) The substantial progress made by the Federal land banks, Production Credit System, and banks for cooperatives operating on a cooperative basis has demonstrated the soundness of that form of organization. It protects the system against making unsound loans. It enhances the prompt collection of installments. It is felt that greater assurance of a completely well-rounded and sound credit system sympathetic to agriculture's needs would be accomplished if the Intermediate Credit System were owned and controlled on a sound cooperative basis by the Production Credit Association and cooperatives which they serve. Cooperative control could be strengthened by a more practical system of election of directors, thereby assuring the borrowers of a voice in the management of their credit affairs.

Adopted unanimously by the National Grange in Peoria, Ill., November 17, 1939.

NATIONAL COOPERATIVE COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C.

The following resolution was adopted at the annual delegate meeting of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, January 10–12, 1940:

"FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

"Since its establishment under that name in 1933, the Farm Credit Administration has been an independent agency of the Federal Government. During the nearly 7 years of its existence as such, it has adhered steadfastly to sound business principles in its agricultural financing and has concerned itself with financing the permanent, and not temporary or emergency, needs of agriculture. It has also met in a constructive manner the credit needs of agricultural cooperatives.

"We regret the change in policy which has terminated the independent status of the Farm Credit Administration. In the past, when suggestions were made for transfer of the Farm Credit Administration to the Treasury Department, the council opposed such change. In conformity with its consistent policy on this point, the National Cooperative Council requests that Congress restore at an early date the independent status so long accorded to the Farm Credit Administration.

"President Roosevelt, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the newly appointed Governor of Farm Credit Administration have now given assurance that there will be no departure from sound credit policies which have made the position of Farm Credit Administration so secure. By reason of these announced policies the Farm Credit Administration and its present officials merit and will receive our continued loyal support.

"We also urge that the general policies of the Farm Credit Administration be continued as in the past, with progressive increases in the cooperative nature of its structure.

"The officers of the council are instructed to oppose vigorously the withdrawal of Federal capital funds from lending agencies serving agriculture in any cases where it is found that such withdrawal will injure the ability of such agencies to serve properly the needs of agriculture."

MARCH 1, 1940.

Hon. GUY M. GILLETTE,
Hon. CARL A. HATCH,
Hon. JAMES M. MEAD,
Hon. JOHN E. MILLER,
Hon. HARRY TRUMAN,
Members of United States Senate.

DEAR SENATORS: The following farm organizations have gone on record as favoring the enactment of legislation designed to reestablish the Farm Credit Administration as an independent agency of Government: The National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives (formerly the National Cooperative Council), the National Wool Growers' Association, and the American National Livestock Association.

These five organizations, representing a large majority of the organized farmers of the Nation, are in accord in this matter, and, after careful study and many conferences, have reached a unanimous agreement as to the suggestions we wish to make.

For sake of brevity and convenience, these suggestions are incorporated in the form of a bill, a copy of which is enclosed. We also enclose copies of resolutions approved by the delegate bodies of these farm organizations.

We wish to have it clearly understood that in advocating the restoration of independent status to the Farm Credit Administration we do not desire to cast any reflection whatever upon the Department of Agriculture. Nor is our advocacy of this proposal related in any way to the individual aims and ambitions of those charged with the present responsibility of carrying on the work of the Administration.

We are strongly of the opinion, however, that supervision of a comprehensive credit system for farmers should be separate and apart from an executive department charged with the execution of any national program not directly related to the actual extension of credits.

Congress has recognized the need for two types of credit agencies for agriculture, each of which is necessary. The Farm Credit Administration was established to supply the sound long-time credit needs of farmers and farmers' cooperatives, while the Department of Agriculture, under various laws, has been designated as the agency through which the emergency credit needs of agriculture are supplied.

When the National Farm Loan System, which was the forerunner of the Farm Credit Administration, was established, it was intended to be a cooperative credit system, controlled by the farmers themselves under Government supervision. It has been and is the hope of farmers that in due time they may become the complete owners of the various agencies included under the Farm Credit Administration, some of which are now self-supporting. Because of this hope, approximately 2,000,000 farmers have invested $130,000,000 of their own money in the various units of the Farm Credit Administration. When all of these units can be placed on a self-sustaining basis, they can be entirely eliminated from the Federal Budget.

It is needless for us to remind you that those engaged in or directly dependent upon agriculture for a livelihood represent more than 40 percent of the population of the country. We believe that this great body of our people is as much entitled to an independent credit organization as are those engaged in industrial, commercial, and financial enterprises.

We hope that our proposal will meet with your approval, and that you will introduce and give your best efforts in behalf of the enactment of the necessary legislation to bring this about. In so doing, we sincerely believe that you will be rendering a service of the utmost importance to agriculture, making it possible, in due time, for the farmer to gain full control of the credit agencies which serve him.

Sincerely and respectfully yours,

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,

Resolution adopted at annual meeting of National Wool Growers' Association, January 23–25, 1940:

"FARM CREDIT

"The Farm Credit Administration has for the past 6 years served agriculture well and has been largely responsible for adequate credit at the lowest rate of interest ever enjoyed by the livestock industry. We question if it can continue the present efficiency and sound lending policies unless its independent status is restored.

We urge Congress to take such action as is necessary to establish this agency on an independent basis, void of the influence of any other bureau or department of Government."

Resolution adopted at annual meeting of American National Livestock Producers, January 11–13, 1940:

"FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

"Whereas the Farm Credit Administration has, by adhering to sound financial policies, provided a dependable source of credit to those engaged in agricultural pursuits, and thereby won the confidence and loyalty of its borrowers; and

"Whereas through its various agencies, reaching into every rural community of the Nation, it has attained a dominent position in agricultural credit; and

"Whereas if the farm-credit system is to continue adequately to serve agriculture, it is essential that extension of credit should not be tied in with any other agricultural program, and that it retain its cooperative features and independence of departmental control: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we urge that the Farm Credit Administration be immediately restored by Congress to its former status as an independent agency and that we authorize and direct our officers and legislative committee to do their utmost to attain that end."

The following resolution was adopted by the executive committee of the American Farm Bureau Federation, January 11, 1940:

"IV. FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

"For 25 years farmers have struggled to build up a sound, effective, permanent, and independent farm-credit system, including the Federal land banks, the intermediate credit banks, the banks for cooperatives, and the production credit system. The ultimate objective is complete farmer ownership and farmer control.

"This objective, we believe, can best be achieved by placing complete administrative responsibility in the hands of a board of governors, as an independent Government agency, members to be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, with terms of members so staggered as to insure continuity of administration.

INTEREST RATES ON FEDERAL LAND BANK AND COMMISSIONER LOANS, ETC.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] has introduced a bill today for himself and for the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and myself, being Senate bill 3509. In connection with that bill, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a statement by the Senators mentioned, and by Representative JONES of Texas, who is introducing a companion bill in the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATORS WHEELER, BANKHEAD, LA FOLLETTE, AND REPRESENTATIVE JONES OF TEXAS

The bill we are today introducing has four objectives:

(1) To make the Federal land-bank system self-supporting, and thereby eliminate the annual subsidies from the Federal Treasury now required; (2) to reduce interest rates on land bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans to 3 percent; (3) to provide a fair and practical method for refinancing farm mortgages, where the farm debt exceeds the fair value of the farm, or where the annual payments on the mortgage exceed the normal farm income; and (4) to decentralize the administration of the land-bank system by increasing the duties and responsibilities of local farm-loan associations.

In addition to these basic changes, the bill also abolishes foreclosure proceedings and deficiency judgments except in cases of willful or negligent damage to the mortgaged property; authorizes the collection of loans on a variable payment system, under which amounts in addition to required payments can be collected in periods of above-normal production or prices and employed to reduce the required payments in periods of subnormal production or prices; and provides for the reamortization of existing Land Bank Commissioner loans on the same terms as are now made available to land-bank borrowers.

It should be emphasized that the bill in no way affects the intermediate credit banks, the production credit corporations or associations, or the banks for cooperatives, but deals solely with the land-bank system.

The following is a statement covering the major provisions of the bill:

1. The present average contract rate on outstanding land-bank loans, and the contract rate on all Land Bank Commissioner loans is 5 percent. By act of Congress, the effective interest rate has been reduced to 3½ percent on land-bank loans and 4 percent on Land Bank Commissioner loans. However, this reduction is temporary and can only be continued so long as Congress appropriates the difference between these effective rates and the contract rates. Approximately $38,000,000 a year must now be appropriated to make up this difference.

Furthermore, land-bank borrowers are now required to subscribe 5 percent of the amount of their loans to capital stock. The result of this requirement is to increase the total interest charge now paid by land-bank borrowers, since interest is charged on the full amount of the borrower's loan, even though 5 percent of the face amount of such loan has been deducted for the purchase of the stock. Besides paying this additional interest, the borrower runs the risk of permanently losing the value of his stock, because such stock must now be pledged as collateral, not only for the borrower's own loan but also for the loans of all other borrowers through his association. In addition, on any defaulted payments, or on amounts advanced for the payment of taxes, liens, judgments, or assessments, borrowers are required to pay interest at the rate of 8 percent per annum.

Under this bill, the present complicated system of varying interest rates, deductions for capital-stock subscriptions, and annual subsidies from the Federal Treasury would be eliminated. The interest rate on all outstanding loans, both from the land banks and the Land Bank Commissioner, would be fixed at 3 percent. New borrowers would no longer be required to subscribe to capital stock, and all present borrowers whose loans are in good standing, and all borrowers who have repaid their loans in full since June 16, 1933, would be immediately credited with the full value of their capital stock, without deduction for losses resulting from the defaults of other borrowers. Future issues of land-bank bonds would be guaranteed by the United States both as to principal and interest, thus enabling the land banks to obtain money at lower rates of interest. All land-bank bonds now held by the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation would be immediately refinanced. Through such guaranty, the annual subsidies now required would be immediately reduced and entirely eliminated by 1946, by which time all of the present land-bank bonds would have become subject to call. After 1946, the interest rate on new loans would be fixed at 1 percent above the yield borne by the fully guaranteed obligations then issued by the land banks.

2. The refinancing provisions of the bill are no less important than the interest provisions.

At the present time, there is no adequate machinery for the refinancing of farm owners burdened with excessive farm mortgages. As a result, large numbers of diligent farmers, whose mortgages were executed in periods of very high prices, are now struggling under impossible debt burdens, with no avenue of escape except foreclosure or abandonment of their farms. To meet this problem, the bill provides a broad refinancing program which will provide immediate and effective relief for deserving farm mortgagors, without opening the door to abuse by unscrupulous borrowers who are actually able to meet their mortgage payments, or by shiftless farmers whose failure has been due to their own fault.

The first safeguard is the provision that no mortgagor can obtain refinancing unless the board of directors of his local farm-loan association or a local county committee of farmers certifies that his application has been filed in good faith; that the mortgage indebtedness is in excess of the productive value of the farm or the annual payments are in excess of the normal farm income; and that the applicant, by reason of his character, ability, and experience, is likely successfully to carry out the undertakings required of him.

As a second safeguard against abuse, the amount of scale-down is not determined immediately. Instead, the mortgagor must convey title to the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation in exchange for a lease for not more than 5 years. At the end of the 5-year lease, or sooner, if circumstances justify, the farmer is given the right to repurchase the property at a price to be fixed on the basis of the actual income value of the farm. In other words, the debt is adjusted not on the basis of an immediate appraisal, which may not reveal the real value of the farm, but on the basis of the actual productive capacity of the farm as disclosed during the lease period.

3. The provisions for increasing the responsibilities and functions of farm-loan associations are urgently needed.

There has been a general impression that the land-bank system is now farmer owned and controlled. The truth is that, except for participation in elections, neither the individual land-bank borrower nor his national farm-loan association has been given an adequate opportunity to participate in the administration of the system.

To assure genuine farmer participation the bill contains the following provisions:

First, the right of the individual borrower to participate in the election of the directors of his association and to vote at membership meetings is no longer made dependent on his subscribing to 5 percent of the amount of his loan in the capital stock of the association. Similarly, the right of the association to participate in the election of the directors of the land banks is no longer dependent on the association's subscribing to stock in the land bank or endorsing loans made through it. The farmer has been told that such stock subscription makes him a part owner in the land-bank system. Nothing could be further from the truth. The stock subscription is not an asset to the borrower, but a liability. Not only is the purchase price of the stock deducted from the loan which he receives, but the stock is pledged as security for the loans of all other borrowers through the association. This feature of the land-bank system, which was borrowed in 1916 from the German landschaft system, was never justified and should be abolished in the same way that the double liability of land-bank borrowers was abolished in 1933.

Second, the bill vests in the local farm-loan association or other local committee of farmers the responsibility for approving all applications for the refinancing and repurchase benefits provided under sections 11 to 14 of the bill.

Third, the Governor is directed to delegate to the associations, wherever feasible, responsibility for the reamortization of Commissioner loans, the establishment of variable-payment plans, and determinations as to whether foreclosure proceedings and deficiency judgments are justified against defaulted borrowers.

(d) The Governor is directed to determine the extent to which farmer participation can be increased by delegating to the associations functions now exercised by the Federal land banks, and to provide for such delegation through appropriate rules and regulations.

(e) The Governor is authorized to require the land banks to compensate the associations through service payments to be deducted from interest payments on all loans or mortgages serviced by the associations.

4. The effect of the bill on the general taxpayer has already been referred to. At present the land-bank system is heavily subsidized by the Federal Government. It has been necessary for the Government to invest over $300,000,000 in capital stock and paid-in surplus to purchase through the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation and the production credit corporations over $800,000,000 of the presently unguaranteed land-bank bonds, and to appropriate annually over $38,000,000 for temporary interest reductions.

This is not our conception of a self-supporting farm-credit system. It is high time that the system was made really self-supporting by completely guaranteeing all future issues of land-bank bonds, in the same manner that the Federal Government now guarantees the obligations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration. Through such guaranty the interest rate payable by land-bank borrowers can be permanently reduced, and the present subsidies out of the Federal Treasury entirely eliminated as soon as the new outstanding bonds have been refunded. The American farmer and the American taxpayer are both entitled to these benefits.

RELIEF OF PEOPLE OF POLAND

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of Members of the Senate to Senate Joint Resolution 207, which I introduced on February 1. This resolution would provide an appropriation of $10,000,000 for the relief of the saddened and stricken people of Poland.

I am hopeful that this proposal will be given early consideration by the committee to which it has been referred. It is a deserving measure, and a modest one, and will not do so much as I should like to see done to protect the lives of people who, for the moment, are completely denied an opportunity to do much, if anything, for themselves.

My proposal to provide Federal funds for the relief of the people of Poland is not the start of an entirely new thing in Congress. For more than 100 years Congress has been providing money to furnish relief for the peoples of other countries who have been overcome by calamity.

As early as 1812 Congress appropriated money to bring relief to earthquake sufferers in Venezuela; and since that time, on different occasions, we have provided assistance and money and relief to the people of Ireland and Scotland and France and Germany and India and Cuba and Costa Rica and China and Armenia and Turkey and Russia and Japan.

I shall not discuss the matter at great length today; but I do want to bring to the attention of the Senate, and the commitee to which the bill has been referred, the fact that this kind of proposal is not new. I want to emphasize the fact that there has probably never been a more distressing situation or a greater need. Our fellow human beings are actually starving.

A few weeks ago I asked the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress to help me compile a list of the acts of Congress relating to the relief of suffering or distressed people of other countries. I ask unanimous consent that there may be published in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the material given to me by the Library's Legislative Reference Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the material will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Act of May 8, 1812 (2 Stat. 730, ch. 79), authorized the President to purchase and tender "such provisions as he shall deem advisable" to the Government of Venezuela "for the relief of the citizens who have suffered by the late earthquake"; and appropriated $50,000 for the purpose.

Resolution of March 3, 1847 (9 Stat. 207, No. 10), authorized the Secretary of the Navy to dispatch two ships to carry contributions "to the famishing poor of Ireland and Scotland."

Resolution of February 10, 1871 (16 Stat. 596, No. 28), authorized the President to station naval vessels at ports of New York City, Boston, and Philadelphia "to receive on board for transportation such supplies as may be furnished by the people of the United States for the destitute and suffering people of France and Germany."

Joint resolution of April 1, 1880 (21 Stat. 303, No. 16), authorized the Secretary of the Navy to employ any vessel of the Navy, or to charter a suitable ship, to carry contributions "to the famishing poor of Ireland"; and appropriated any necessary sum of money therefor.

Joint resolution of February 19, 1897 (29 Stat. 701–702), as amended June 1, 1897 (30 Stat. 220, No. 12) authorized the Secretary of the Navy to charter not over two vessels to transport contributions for the relief of "the famishing poor of India"; and appropriated any necessary sum of money therefor.

Joint resolution of April 7, 1897 (30 Stat. 219, No. 8), authorized the Secretary of the Navy to charter an American vessel of 2,400 tons capacity to transport contributions "to the famishing poor of India"; and appropriated any necessary sum of money therefor.

Act of May 18, 1898 (30 Stat. 419, ch. 345), authorized Army officers during the Spanish War to issue supplies and otherwise render aid to "inhabitants of the island of Cuba who are destitute and in imminent danger of perishing unless they receive the same."

Act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. 1069), appropriated $100,000 for Army subsistence supplies "to be issued to inhabitants of the island of Cuba who are destitute and in imminent danger of perishing unless they receive the same."

Act of May 13, 1902 (32 Stat. 198, ch. 787), appropriated $200,000 to enable the President to distribute provisions, clothing, medicines, etc., and "take such other steps as he shall deem advisable for the purpose of rescuing and succoring the people who are in peril and threatened with starvation" after the eruption of Mont Pelee in the French West Indies; and requested the President to obtain the approval of the French Government.

Act of January 18, 1907 (34 Stat. 850, ch. 154), authorized the President to distribute any necessary naval stores "among the suffering and destitute people of the island of Jamaica," suffering in consequence of an earthquake and conflagration.

Act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat. 387, sec. 7), relieved officers of Isthmian Canal Commission from liability for $11,205.53 for "materials and supplies furnished to the sufferers by the Jamaican earthquake" of January 14, 1907.

Act of January 9, 1909 (35 Stat. 584, ch. 7), appropriated $800,000 to enable the President to distribute "provisions, clothing, medicines, and other necessary articles" among the "suffering and destitute people of Italy," suffering in consequence of an earthquake; and authorized the employment of any vessels of the Navy or other vessels for this purpose.

Act of May 13, 1910 (36 Stat. 367, ch. 232), authorized the President to distribute "tents, blankets, and other necessary articles" among the "suffering and destitute people of Costa Rica," suffering in consequence of an earthquake.

Act of February 18, 1911 (36 Stat. 919, ch. 114), authorized the Secretary of War to use an Army transport for carriage to China, under supervision of American Red Cross, of "supplies donated by the people of the United States for the relief of the sufferers from famine in China"; and appropriated $50,000 for expenses.

Joint resolution of August 20, 1914 (38 Stat. 777), authorized the American Red Cross "during the continuance of the present war" to charter vessels of foreign registry, to carry the American flag, "for all uses in connection with the work of said society." The purposes of the society enumerated in the act of January 5, 1905 (33 Stat. 600, sec. 3), include carrying on a system of international relief in time of peace and applying it in mitigating sufferings caused by pestilence, famine, etc.

Joint resolution of September 11, 1914 (38 Stat. 778, No. 40), appropriated $1,000,000 to enable the United States to fulfill the obligations devolving upon it in connection with its representation of the interests of foreign Governments and their nationals, to "extend temporary assistance to other governments and their nationals made necessary by hostilities" in Europe and elsewhere, and "for the care or benefit of citizens or subjects of foreign nations." (The acts of March 4, 1915 (33 Stat. 1138), and September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. 802), reappropriated the unexpended balance of this appropriation for the same purposes.)

Act of May 22, 1918 (40 Stat. 558, ch. 80), authorized national banks to contribute to the American Red Cross and provided that all money so contributed should be used in furnishing aid to wounded soldiers, etc., and "the relief and mitigation of the suffering caused by the war to the people of the United States and their allied nations." (Such contributions were presumably outside the scope of the ordinary corporate powers of national banks; see 24 U. S. C. 12.)

The Naval Appropriation Act of July 1, 1918 (40 Stat. 705), authorized the Secretary of the Navy to ascertain and pay "all claims for damages to and loss of private property of inhabitants of any European country not an enemy or ally of an enemy" caused by "men in the naval service during the period of the present war," provided any such claim does not exceed $1,000.

Act of February 25, 1919 (40 Stat. 1161, ch. 38), appropriated $100,000,000 for purchase, transportation, and distribution of "foodstuffs and other urgent supplies" to populations in Europe outside of Germany, German Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey (but including Armenians and other Christian and Jewish subjects of Turkey); expenditures to be reimbursed as far as possible by the peoples thereby relieved.

Act of July 11, 1919 (41 Stat. 130, ch. IV), authorized the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the American Red Cross any "medical and surgical supplies and supplementary and dietary foodstuffs" no longer necessary for the United States Army, to be used "to relieve and supply the pressing needs of the peoples of countries involved in the late war."

Act of March 30, 1920 (41 Stat. 548, ch. 113), authorized the United States Grain Corporation to dispose of flour in its possession up to 5,000,000 barrels "to relieve populations in the countries of Europe or countries contiguous thereto suffering from the want of food."

Act of December 22, 1921 (42 Stat. 351, ch. 15), authorized the President to expend $20,000,000 of funds of the United States Grain Corporation for corn, seed grain, and preserved milk to be distributed "for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia and for spring planting in areas where seed grains have been exhausted."

Act of January 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 357, ch. 30), authorized the President to transfer up to $4,000,000 worth of surplus medical, etc., supplies to American relief organizations without charge "for the relief of the distressed and famine-stricken people of Russia."

Deficiency Appropriation Act of March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 460), appropriated $107,746.17 for European food relief.

Act of May 28, 1924 (43 Stat. 195), authorized the Navy Postmaster General to expend from the naval supply account issues ordered by the Secretary of the Navy "for the relief of sufferers in Japan following the earthquake which occurred September 1, 1923."

Act of February 24, 1925 (43 Stat. 963, ch. 297), approved issuance of Army supplies up to $6,017,069.03 "for the relief of sufferers from the earthquake in Japan on September 1, 1923."

NOTE.—The act of February 12, 1794 (6 Stat. 13, ch. 2), appropriated $15,000 for the support of inhabitants of Santo Domingo resident within the United States in want of such support. The account of the moneys so expended was to be lodged in the Treasury Department and charged to the debit of the French Republic.

The President, by a proclamation of August 25, 1906 (34 Stat. 3227), asked for contributions through the National Red Cross Association for relief in connection with earthquake at Valparaiso, Chile.

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, some weeks ago I made inquiries of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission on the subject of Senate bill 2009, which is now in conference. They wrote to me a letter which by some means got into the press. I did not give it out. Since then I have received an answer to this communication from the committee known as the President's Committee.

Without intending to influence the conferees in any way, I now ask leave to have the original letter, with the answer, printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators, with a view to the hour when the conference report shall come before the Senate. May I have that consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The letters are as follows:

FEBRUARY 16, 1940.

Hon. JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
Chairman, Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission submit, in accordance with your request by letter of January 11, 1940, this joint statement as to the probable effects on water transportation and the national economy of the regulatory legislation proposed in the bill S. 2009 as it passed the Senate, together with the House amendments thereto. On separate occasions during the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress the War Department, the Department of Agriculture, and the United States Maritime Commission presented their views either on individual bills or on all of the bills (S. 2009; H. R. 2531 and H. R. 4862) relating to the regulation of transportation. This statement, however, limits the comments to the provisions of S. 2009 as it passed the Senate and the House.

Such legislation would seriously affect the national defense, agriculture, and shipping, as well as other industry and commerce generally. The Departments of War and Agriculture, and the Maritime Commission, are vitally concerned with measures designed to develop and maintain adequate and efficient transportation for the basic needs of the country. In addition to its general interest, the Department of War is charged with a particular responsibility in the protection, preservation, and enhancement of the value of the country's investment in its Great Lakes system and its system of rivers, harbors, and canals. The Secretary of Agriculture, because of the responsibility which the Department has in affairs affecting the welfare of agriculture, is authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (sec. 201 of title II) to make complaints to the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to the transportation of farm products. The concern of the Maritime Commission is that of fostering and encouraging, as authorized by law, the development and maintenance of an adequate and well-balanced American merchant marine in the interest of the national defense and the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States.

The prompt passage of various transportation bills introduced in the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress was urged in order to meet an emergency in railroad transportation requiring quick remedial legislation on the part of the Government. There is no longer the same emergency condition. Indeed, if there is an emergency, it is in the water-borne commerce. In general, the net operating income of the railroads has risen with great rapidity in the last few months. However, the basic problems of transportation still persist. The war conditions and the enactment of neutrality legislation have given rise to sharp dislocations in our foreign commerce and shipping. The war now raging may have profound effects upon our domestic commerce and transportation, and should give us pause before finally adopting legislation providing for extended and possibly inflexible regulation of water transportation. Such legislation would require a long-continued and difficult process of readjustment of shipping operations, and might disturb our national economy in many ways, and affect the availability of merchant shipping for national-defense purposes. Unless the proposed legislation is clearly required in the interest of the public and of the shippers and consumers, existing rates and services of water carriers should not be subjected to such a burdensome thing as a radical change in regulative policy at a time when the disorganizing, destructive, and confusing effects of war are being felt.

While there are important differences between the bill as passed by the Senate and the House amendments, both provide for comprehensive regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission of all common and contract carriers by water in interstate commerce in three ways:

(a) By transferring from the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission regulatory functions over domestic water carriers (the Maritime Commission's jurisdiction over foreign commerce would not be touched).

(b) By subjecting to the Interstate Commerce Commission's jurisdiction certain water carriers not presently regulated; and

(c) By extending regulation to new subject matters.

THE THEORY OF THE PENDING LEGISLATION

The Senate bill or the House amendments, if enacted, would bring all the important agencies of interstate transportation, excepting air carriers, under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Proponents of this development in regulation justify it largely upon an assumption of "keen and close" competition of these agencies with each other. By means of certificates of public convenience and necessity and permits, as well as through the use of minimum rate control, it is proposed to curb so-called cutthroat or destructive competition. Stress is also laid in the general declaration of policy upon the need for fair and equal regulation of all agencies of transportation, but with care to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of each. The omission of air transportation, however, destroys the basis of the argument for unification of regulation. Specific provisions tend to render ineffective the general declaration of policy in the pending bill.

The basic purpose of railroad regulation, as embodied in the granger legislation of the 1870's and in the act of 1887 to regulate commerce, was to protect the public against extortionate rail rates, unjust discriminations, and undue preferences. With the passage of the Transportation Act of 1920, however, the public began to assume responsibility for the financial condition of the railroads. An endeavor was made to restrict competition of railroads with each other and with other types of carriers. Minimum rate provisions were adopted for the purpose of limiting price competition.

The body of this statement is divided into three parts corresponding generally, though not exactly, to the interest of the different agencies of the Government joining herein. Part I discusses a primary concern of the Department of Agriculture, that is, the probable effect of the proposed water-carrier regulation on the national transportation rate level and structure, both from the standpoint of the producer and the consumer. Part II is devoted to a consideration of the existing regulatory power of the Maritime Commission over water carriers, the undesirable effects of extending the railroad regulation plan to water transportation, and the need for careful adjustment of water-carrier regulation to the diverse types of water transportation involved. Part III considers the national policy for the improvement of inland waterways, the place of such waterways in the national transportation system, and its cost and its value to the Nation and to the shippers and consumers.

PART I. THE PROPOSED REGULATION OF WATER TRANSPORTATION AND THE EFFECT ON DISTRIBUTION AND PRICES OF COMMODITIES

When motor carriers were brought under Federal regulation in 1935, minimum-rate control was applied to both common and contract operations. While the proposals with respect to water carriers may be in the same direction, they are not justified unless such control is in the public interest. So far as we are aware, however, there has not been convincing evidence that shippers and consumers have benefited, or are likely to benefit, from this method of regulating motor and water carriers. On the contrary, both the Senate bill and the House amendments would expand and change the method of regulation of water transportation on the theory that the present economic situation of the railroads requires the form of regulation of water carriers provided for in the Senate bill and the House amendments in direct conflict with the general declaration of policy. As a matter of fact, many farm organizations, shippers, and their trade associations are alarmed at the proposals which they contain and sincerely believe that enactment of measures embodied therein would be detrimental to their interests. The farmers and other shippers in particular are convinced that the effect of the present bills would be to force water-transportation rates to levels closely approximating those of rail rates and higher than necessary to reflect the reasonable cost of water transportation, and that they, the users of water transportation, would be footing the bill for the sole benefit of the railroads.

Rail and water transportation have different economic characteristics

The commonly accepted justification given for the extension of the regulation now applied to railroads to other forms of transport than the railroads fails to distinguish between the distinct economic features of each agency of transport in relation to public policy. Unrestrained competition between railroads or between railroads and other forms of transport may be, and often is, destructive in character. The public interest would be better served by confining the movement of traffic to carriers or routes able to handle it profitably at low rates. There is real danger that the proposed legislation would result in an arrangement whereby rates would go high enough to yield profits to carriers or routes incurring the highest expense. The rail carriers have large, expensive plants, and a substantial proportion of their costs does not vary with traffic. They are operating considerably below an optimum level of traffic. Hence, the railroads not only have an incentive to lower their competitive rates to a level often little, if any, above out-of-pocket costs, but because of size and financial strength they have the ability to engage in vigorous destructive competition for a considerable period of time. They place high rates on noncompetitive traffic, of which a significant proportion consists of agricultural products, to make up their revenue deficiencies on the competition-compelled reduced rates. The railroads' power in this manner to destroy or injure competing carriers thus injures also the main body of rail traffic, and is not fully controlled by the long-and-short-haul clause, minimum-rate regulation, and other statutory measures.

Wholly different conditions prevail in the water and truck industries. The investment in trucks, and frequently in water equipment, is relatively small, and most of the costs of these carriers, especially of the motor carriers, vary directly with traffic. Variations in motor or water traffic can be taken care of by appropriate additions to or deductions from equipment, since each vehicle or small combination is a complete carrying unit. Rates for different carriers providing these services tend toward a common level, for the operations are essentially small scale and competitive in nature. In these competitive industries the opportunity to discriminate is curtailed by the shipper's ability to transfer his custom to another firm. The water lines and trucks are more dependent for recovery of their expenses on rates that yield the operator's cost of particular services than are the railroads. This means that they, more than the railroads, are under a natural restraint not to practice destructive competition, and that there is less need in their cases for the imposition of statutory and artificial controls. That this has been recognized by Congress for more than half a century is evidenced by the long-and-short-haul clause, which imposed a necessary restraint on railroad power to destroy water competition and left the water carriers the larger freedom which the public interest required that they should have.

Thus, while maintenance of the controls now exercised over railroad rates is justified by economic considerations, we have grave doubts that identical rate regulation is required of the rail competitors. Regulation of safety and the requirement of public responsibility are without doubt justified. But failure to make proper economic distinctions between these industries only postpones the sound solution of the transportation problem in terms of the public interest.

Transportation problem a segment of the national problems of industrial depression, domestic and foreign trade barriers, and unemployment

What then are the remedies for the so-called transportation problem? In the first place, it should be recognized that the transportation problem is only a part of a larger problem. In reality the country faces an economic problem which largely consists of finding ways and means of increasing employment, production, and consumption to the end that our economic system can operate at reasonably full capacity under democratic controls.

The railroads and other agencies of transport are significantly affected by and can contribute measurably to the solution to this all-important social and economic problem. Unfortunately, the railroads seem determined to find a solution for the admittedly difficult financial situation of certain rail carriers without regard for the more general solution; in fact, from their public statements it would seem that they are seeking to solve their difficulties at the expense of agricultural and other shippers, consumers, and taxpayers.

Farmers and other shippers should not be required to pay rates based on transportation costs of properties improvidently built, wastefully operated, or partially obsolete. The advocacy of thorough regulation of the minimum rates of motor and water carriers by a centralized agency appears to represent an attempt to use Government power to bring competing transportation agencies into a cartel, and in this manner to share traffic and adjust rates in such a way as to earn a return upon all transportation capital of these agencies. The present high rail-rate level would be protected from the impact of vigorous competition. Undoubtedly such a policy would also result in more rigid rates in times of depression, since the motor carrier and the boat line would no longer play their role as an effective competitive force in bringing down rail rates on commodities susceptible to rail or truck, and rail or water movement.

Flexible rate structure to promote distribution

As stated above, the transportation problem is usually presented as an emergency requiring quick action on the part of the Government, which is requested to take action which will inevitably raise rates and throttle competitors in order to save the railroads. The suggestion that the railroads effect a rationalization of the railroad plan to eliminate uneconomic transportation services and adjust their charges in line with the lessened ability of shippers to pay goes unheeded.

The primary purpose of the Congress is to foster our domestic commerce by endeavoring to have transportation services supplied at reasonable costs, to be fair to the carriers in the trade, but not to favor them at the expense of the shipping public. It is particularly important that this congressional purpose be adhered to at the present time in the interest of our national economy in order to promote the use of these facilities in the solution of one of our major economic problems; that is, the greater distribution of farm products and other basic commodities.

The Department of Agriculture, for some years, has been advocating greater flexibility in rail rates, and lower rather than higher unit rates especially, as an aid in marketing surpluses of farm products and as vital prerequisites to the restoration of economic health to agriculture, to industry, and to transportation itself. As a means of improving the purchasing power of industrial labor and the urban population for surplus farm products, and that of the farmers for industrial, employment-giving products, the Department of Agriculture is working vigorously on plans and programs to obtain a larger distribution of such surplus farm products. The transportation factor is a large element in the cost of distributing farm products. Lower rail rates to reduce the great barrier of distance is an essential condition to the success of this effort to bring about a more effective functioning of our economy. Any improvement in the way of lowering distribution costs is likely to go to the farmer, the industrial worker, and the consumer.

The proposal to extend minimum-rate regulation to water carriers is not the solution for railroad and other transportation problems. This proposal involves the very real danger of advancing one more step toward the formation of a transportation cartel with restricted transportation services and a rate level sufficient to pay a return upon all sunk capital, whether or not it is needed by the public. This gives no promise of a solution of transportation problems in the public interest.

The land-grant railroads

A further provision of the bill as amended in the House of Representatives is of considerable consequence. Section 321 of part II, title III, page 301 of the printed bill, would relieve the land-grant railroads from the obligation of transporting employees or property of the Federal Government at less than the commercial rates. The preferential rates which the Government has enjoyed as a contractual right and which the Government would relinquish by the terms of this section are a specific condition of the large grants of land made to the railroads in earlier times. Almost 20,000,000 acres of these lands are still owned by six of the roads, but are not used in connection with their operation. The character, location, and use of much of this land are such that the existing maladjustments in land use occasioned by their present ownership would be greatly aggravated by their sale or transfer to numerous private operators. It is anticipated that over the next decade or two much of this land will, in fact, need to be reacquired by the Federal Government. The lands remaining in the ownership of the grantee railroads or their subsidiaries, of course, are the residue of the original grants, the parts for which there has been no demand by purchasers and only limited demand at low rates by renters. By and large, the lands which continue in the ownership of the land-grant railroads are, in very large part, the types of land for which public responsibility and management seem to be an almost inevitable and imperative requirement. Between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 acres of these lands are within existing boundaries of national forests in large part checkerboarded with Federal lands and influencing their use. Other undetermined acreages are within the boundaries of Taylor grazing districts, national parks, reclamation withdrawals, and so forth. If these reservations are to be made effective it will be necessary in time for the United States to regain ownership of such of the lands within their boundaries as are now in private ownership. The normal expectation is that the owner of such lands will demand payment of considerations in cash or kind to induce them to part with the title.

The section of S. 2009 under discussion proposes to release the railroads from the obligation of transporting employees and property of the Federal Government at reduced rates.

If it is fair and equitable for the United States now to surrender its legal rights under these contracts, it would seem to be fair and equitable for the railroads involved similarly to surrender their residual rights under the same contracts; in other words to restore to the United States such parts of the granted lands as have not passed out of the ownership and control of the railroads and are not needed or used in the operation of the railroads.

Under such an arrangement the rights relinquished by the United States would be large and positive; those which would be relinquished by the railroads relatively small and of nebulous value.

PART II.—THE EXISTING REGULATION OF WATER CARRIERS AND ITS RELATION TO REGULATION OF RAILROADS

The Maritime Commission now has extensive jurisdiction over the rates and practices of common and contract carriers by water in the intercoastal trade and in particular may prescribe the maximum and minimum rates which they may charge. Similar jurisdiction is also exercised over the coastwise common carriers, except that as to those operating on the Great Lakes maximum rates only may be prescribed. All such regulatory power is by S. 2009 and the House amendments transferred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is to be noted in this connection that Congress in 1938, by withholding authority to the Maritime Commission to prescribe minimum rates for the Great Lakes common carriers, recognized that this particular form of regulation was not necessary or desirable in the interests of the carriers and the shippers using their facilities. The bill would authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe minimum rates for this class of carriers.

The Senate bill and the House amendments not only greatly expand the scope of regulation of the rates and related practices of the water carriers but give to the Interstate Commerce Commission entirely new jurisdiction in other respects. The most important extensions of jurisdiction are the requirement of certificates of public convenience and necessity for the common carriers by water, the requirement of permits for contract carriers by water, and the regulation of the issuance of securities by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of both classes of carriers.

Regulation of water transportation and trade differences

Congress so far has not seen fit to subject to Federal regulation the rates and practices of contract carriers in the coastwise trade nor common (except as to joint rail and water rates) or contract carriers plying on the inland waters. Congress has taken particular care in the past to give full consideration to essential differences not only in the type of water carriers subjected to regulation but also in the various trades in which they may operate. Under the bill the regulatory provisions affecting contract and common water carriers are made applicable without sufficient consideration being given to the basic differences arising from the character of the trade in which they may be engaged. One striking example is that, by prescribing the same general form of regulation for all contract carriers, the existing power to prescribe maximum rates for the intercoastal contract carriers would be destroyed. Congress in enacting the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, considered it important to grant the power to prescribe maximum rates of contract carriers for the protection of shippers in this particular trade.

Intercoastal water traffic not important to railroads

The problems of the intercoastal carriers are mainly problems existing as between themselves, as Congress recognized in passing the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, which gave the Maritime Commission a more extended jurisdiction over this class of carriers at that time than in the case of coastwise carriers. Much of the traffic in the intercoastal trade consists of bulk commodities which the railroads could carry only at rates unremunerative to them, making up the losses on other traffic. Even if all of the intercoastal traffic were carried by rail, it would not add substantially to the total tonnage of the railroads which are competitive. A fair comparison of the relative importance of the rail and water movements may be drawn from the fact that the seven principal western railroads carried 208,000,000 short tons of revenue freight in 1936, whereas both the common and the contract intercoastal carriers by water together carried 7,500,000 short tons. If this water traffic had moved by these western railroads, it would have increased their revenue tonnage by only 3.6 percent, and by reason of the low rates applicable to most of the commodities, their revenues would have been increased by an even smaller percentage.

Coastwise water traffic not generally competitive with rail traffic

As to the coastwise trade including the Great Lakes, the portion of the cargo carried by these water lines as bulk cargo, such as petroleum, ore, coal, phosphate rock, and sulfur, which, owing to the low cost at which it can be moved by water, is not generally competitive as between the water carriers and the railroads, is even greater than in the intercoastal trade. In the general cargo which moves in the coastwise trade there is included a substantial amount of transshipment cargo originating in or destined for foreign ports. The real problems relating to transshipment cargo are, first, to prevent its diversion to direct ocean carriers, most of which are foreign-owned foreign-flag lines, and, second, to further the development of this type of traffic. The Senate bill, which makes transshipment cargo subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission as to that part of the movement which is between ports in the United States, would in practice preclude domestic carriers from entering into transshipment arrangements with carriers in foreign commerce, and therefore would force existing traffic to these direct lines and prevent any further development of transshipment business.

Common carriers in the coastwise trade are now regulated by the Maritime Commission. Competition between contract carriers in the coastwise trade and the railroads is negligible. Both those operating on the high seas and those operating on the Great Lakes compete, if at all, only with the common carriers by water in those trades. It is these common carriers by water which desire, and would possibly be benefited by, the regulation of the contract carriers in these trades to the same extent as the common carriers. Suffice it to say that these problems primarily concern domestic water transportation and have little relationship to the problems of the rail carriers.

Problems of inland trade carriers considered in the light of historical national policy of low-cost water transportation

The extensive improvement of our inland-waterway system, which the United States Government has financed, indicates the clear purpose of Congress to provide for transportation, particularly of our basic commodities, at rates which reflect economies of water transportation. Commissioner Splawn, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, stated during the hearings on the Lea bill (H. R. 2531) before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House that the strengthening of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1920 was for the purpose of regulating the railroads on the theory that they had a substantial monopoly of domestic transportation. In addition to more rigid regulation of this monopoly, Congress decided to provide for the extensive development of inland rivers and canals, the coastwise water facilities. Waterways were developed and improvements made in order to meet the requirements of shippers and the general public for low-cost transportation and to escape from the virtual monopoly of the railroads.

Railroads monopolistic agencies with large fixed investments—water carriers competitive, with easy expansion or contraction of services

The railroad carriers may be considered as inherent monopolies in certain fields of transportation, while the water carriers have no natural monopoly in respect to water transportation. Every effort of the Maritime Commission with respect to the water carriers has been to prevent them from becoming monopolies and to retain the greatest freedom of competition consistent with service to the public. A railroad represents a huge investment in fixed properties, and the communities it serves would, in many instances, be greatly injured by its discontinuance. In the case of water carriage, the problem is in maintaining the transportation service, but not necessarily, however, by the particular carrier then in the trade. Consequently, the Maritime Commission, in viewing regulatory matters, stresses the adequacy of the service as a whole to the persons employing it and the reasonableness of the carriers' rates with relation to the needs of both the shippers and the consumers. The maintenance of a particular carrier in trade, although not neglected, is not given controlling weight. It is felt that of necessity the Interstate Commerce Commission would have to use as a measure in all of its determinations involving the competitive efforts of the railroads and the water carriers to get business the railroads' struggle for existence.

Certificates of public convenience and necessity foster monopoly and destroy flexibility of service

The Senate bill and the House amendments provide for the issuance to all common carriers by water of certificates of public convenience and necessity by the Interstate Commerce Commission before such carriers may engage in water transportation. At present only those common carriers joining with railroads in publishing joint rates are required to obtain such certificates. Certificates of public convenience and necessity originated in the monopolistic character of railroads and serve a wholly justifiable purpose in preventing the creation of permanent uneconomic competition in that industry. On the other hand, domestic water carriers can compete among themselves without the withdrawal of any particular carrier being disastrous to the public and without the necessity for any carrier to continue to operate under circumstances which would ruin it. If for any reason one of the water carriers in the trade ceases operations, the transportation service which it offers can, in most instances, be taken care of through expansion of the facilities of the other carriers or through a new carrier entering the trade. Certificates of public convenience and necessity should not be used to create a monopoly in the branch of transportation industry where monopoly is presently nonexistent and where the public interest requires that competition, although it should be regulated to prevent abuses, should not be limited or discouraged. The great advantage of water transportation to shippers is the flexibility and variety of service it can offer. Certificates of public convenience and permits would destroy this advantage and stifle competition. The same effect of stifling competition is discernible in the provisions of the bills, that except with the permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission, no carrier can operate both as a common carrier and a contract carrier. While there may be some objections to this dual form of operation under particular circumstances, in general it is desirable to have that flexibility.

Applicable statutes now protect investors in water transportation securities

As to the control of issuance of securities by domestic water carriers, it must be borne in mind that whenever there is a public issue or distribution of such securities the Securities and Exchange Commission presently has the regulatory powers necessary to protect the investing public. As to Government loans under title V of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and insurances of preferred mortgages under title XI, the Maritime Commission's jurisdiction thereover is entirely adequate, because of definite and detailed legislative requirements in connection with such loans and insurance. Since the matter is covered by applicable statutes, the only reason that could be given for vesting control of the issuance of securities in the Interstate Commerce Commission is that the credit opportunities of the water carrier should be limited for the benefit of the railroads.

Transportation regulation in connection with governmental promotion of domestic and foreign shipping

One of the reasons advanced for the transfer of jurisdiction over the water carriers from the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission is the supposed existence of some conflict between the regulatory functions of the Maritime Commission and its so-called promotional functions. These so-called promotional functions are not carte blanche delegations, but are express statutory powers given by Congress in order that the Maritime Commission may promote domestic and foreign shipping in the interest of our commerce and our national defense. As far as domestic water carriers are concerned, the only powers which the Maritime Commission has apart from regulation are to assist them in the construction of new vessels, through loans for such construction under title V of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and to aid in the financing of new construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning through the insurance of ship mortgages under title XI of the act, as amended in 1938. In exercising these functions the Maritime Commission acts in very much the same manner as the Interstate Commerce Commission does in passing upon applications of the railroads for approval of the issuance of securities. Furthermore, the Senate bill inconsistently provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of water carriers pass upon their credit needs both in the case of public and private financing while at the same time regulating them.

Difficulties and uncertainties arising from attempt to place all transportation agencies under a uniform code

As Commissioner Eastman pointed out in his testimony on S. 2009, from the point of view of rail regulation the Senate bill is a codification, with many changes in language, of the Interstate Commerce Act, and these changes in language would make the task of interpreting and applying the Senate bill to the railroads extremely difficult. The bill makes an even greater change in language and intent from the portions of the shipping acts, the subject of which is incorporated therein, particularly because language used is made equally applicable to all classes of carriers. The attempt to apply terms and definitions heretofore used with particular reference to specific types of carriers by way of omnibus legislation for both the railroad industry and the shipping industry will entail serious difficulties in interpretation and administration.

Recent congressional policy with respect to unification of rail and water carrier regulation

Congress has previously rejected all requests of the railroads or the Interstate Commerce Commission to place the regulation of water carriers under that Federal agency. The Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as it was originally enacted, contained a provision authorizing the President after 2 years to transfer the regulatory powers of the Maritime Commission over water carriers to the Interstate Commerce Commission. On the basis of a careful study of this problem by the Maritime Commission, the Congress saw fit in the Seventy-fifth Congress, second session, to withdraw this authority for transfer by Executive action.

Cooperation in regulation as a means of archieving desirable objectives of unified administration

Coordination is a very desirable objective, but it is best obtained by a proper spirit of cooperation between various agencies of the Government, each of which is expert as to the several problems involved and not through subordination either in theory or in practice of one phase of the problem to the other. The Maritime Commission has always cooperated very closely with the Interstate Commerce Commission as to water rates which in any way affect rail rates. It has recognized the gravity of the railroad problem and in practice given most careful consideration to the effect of any regulatory action which it has taken upon the railroad rate structure. More than this cannot justifiably be asked.

PART III. THE PUBLIC INVESTMENT IN, AND THE NATIONAL BENEFITS OF, THE INLAND WATERWAYS SYSTEM

Inherent differences in the character and functions of the several modes of transport require altogether different treatment. Inland water service, for instance, is slow, limited of access, unadapted to high-class commodity movements, and subject to occasional interruptions from fog, ice, low water, and flood conditions. To offset these disadvantages it enjoys flexibility of routes and schedules to meet the varying demands of consumers and the operator's cost is usually very low. It plays an essential part in certain basic industries of the country. In particular, it neither occupies nor needs exclusive right-of-way in order to function. The pending legislation, however, threatens to nullify these inherent advantages by imposing restrictions which will, in our opinion, unwarrantably sacrifice the public investment in low-cost transportation without any compensating benefits whatever.

On the face of it there could be no valid grounds for objection to the regulation of waterways and water carriers "so administered as to recognize and preserve their inherent advantages." If these objectives were faithfully carried out by an agency of the Federal Government familiar with their special limitations and potentialities, a far greater volume of water-borne tonnage would develop than has been permitted to seek the waterways under the present competitive system. The question which causes us deep concern is whether "equal" regulation as proposed in the pending legislation will recognize and allow for these inherent differences. Under the guise of equality it is quite possible that rules and restrictions applicable to railroads could be given literal application to waterways with completely destructive effect.

Railroad practices in meeting water competition

The large preponderance of rail freight, by reason of its character or location, is not open to water competition, and this noncompetitive traffic can be and is taxed by the railroads under the existing system by means of high rail rates in order to maintain low rail rates between river ports. In many cases these water competitive rates do not bear a full share of the cost of rail service. These low rates are defended and sanctioned on the much abused out-of-pocket-cost theory. Such rates, even when they yield no profit, serve the carriers' purpose in that they deprive competing waterways of tonnage which they might profitably handle. The water carriers have no backlog of noncompetitive tonnage upon which to shift the burden of competitive rate reductions, all of their traffic being equally adapted to rail transport except in the ability to bear high rates. The water carriers' only salvation lies in their genuinely low operating costs. Even so, if the campaign could be continued long enough by the rail carriers, without bankrupting themselves or their shippers, the water lines could eventually be starved out of business and the rail monopoly restored. Apparently the intent of the Congress to protect legitimate water traffic from unfair competition was expressed in the long-and-short-haul clause of the existing law, but relief from its restrictions is now frequently granted by existing regulatory agencies, wherever waterways enter the picture. The shipping public is thus led to forego the real economic benefits provided by the waterways at public expense and to accept in lieu thereof rail rate reductions which work injury to the railroads themselves. The very questionable advantages which the rail carriers derive from the practice are a depletion of waterway tonnage, a consequently misleading rise in waterway costs per ton-mile, and the discrediting of the sound policy of river improvement by the Federal Government.

We are convinced that the above-described practices, and not the comparatively small volume of tonnage actually moved by water, are largely responsible for the plight of the railroad industry. Commissioner Eastman summed up the situation last year in his concurring opinion in the Fifteen Percent case, as follows:

"Since 1922, however, there have been no general changes in rates, except for the emergency charges. We have made many readjustments of particular kinds or classes of rates, some upward and some downward. Possibly the latter have somewhat predominated, but certainly nothing that we have done has accounted for the drop in average ton-mile revenue from 1.116 cents in 1923 to 0.974 cent in 1936. Without doubt that has been caused in very large part by reductions in rates made voluntarily by the railroads to meet motortruck or water-carrier competition, and to a lesser degree by an increase in average length of haul and changes in the relative amounts of the various kinds of traffic, likewise the result of competition."

The Interstate Commerce Commission also very aptly described the situation thus in Ex Parte 115 some 2 years ago:

"In their need for increased revenues, applicants (the railroads) have been careful to avoid proposing any increases in rates which have been published to meet the competition of other forms of transportation, although these are the depressed rates which are so largely responsible for their financial troubles."

No public complaints as to water-transportation policies

As far as we are aware, there is no dissatisfaction on the part of the public with the transportation service afforded on the inland waterways; charges are of necessity fully compensatory, and there is no destructive rate warfare as between carriers. It seems to be generally accepted that the need for rehabilitation of the insolvent railroads has been brought about in large part by certain wasteful fiscal and operating practices and conditions within that industry itself, and it would naturally be expected that remedial legislation would direct itself in the main toward the correction of those unwholesome conditions. Much, undoubtedly, could be done in the way of reducing unnecessary and wasteful duplication of rail terminal and interchange facilities and operations, which the Federal Coordinator of Transportation found to be "one of the greatest items of railroad expense and probably accounting for more than 50 percent of the total expense."

All the provisions of the bills seem designed to free the railroads from restraints and obligations, while imposing restrictions on their water competitors and making it more expensive for the public to move freight. Under these provisions inland water carriers can easily be regulated out of existence without the recapture of enough tonnage to affect railroad earnings appreciably. At best the provisions would tend to discourage the development of water-borne tonnage on important links of the inland system now nearing completion or but recently completed and opened to pioneer traffic. In fact, surveys by the War Department indicate that the consequent rise in the cost of service would be calculated to discourage the movement of freight which requires cheap transportation.

Inland-waterway improvements based on careful transportation planning

For many years the Chief of Engineers of the War Department has built up and maintained a technical staff of transportation and traffic specialists familiar with all types of carriers, whose function includes not only the thorough study of the economic phases of each proposed river and harbor improvement and the effect on existing transportation agencies, but also the conduct of economic analyses of going waterway projects and their effect on the movement of traffic. They have gathered representative data and have developed satisfactorily consistent unit costs covering the movement of freight by rail and water under a wide variety of conditions. It would otherwise be impossible for the War Department to render efficiently the detailed and comprehensive reports on river and harbor improvements required by the Congress. It would also be impossible to render sound and balanced reports as to the merits of proposed improvements without coordinating these economic studies with field surveys showing the physical limitations as to size, type, capacity, and cost of navigation facilities in their relation to the comprehensive plan of development. No difficulty is encountered by the War Department in cooperating with other Government departments in the public interest wherever responsibilities or jurisdiction overlap, and it is at a loss to account for the theory that the grouping of all transportation investigations exclusively under one agency or board would guarantee more complete impartiality or efficiency, or would compensate for divorcing cost estimates from the corresponding appraisals of benefits. Economic studies are an essential part of engineering surveys.

Public benefits from low-cost water transportation

The overwhelming preponderance of testimony on these questions is partisan in character, and while there is nothing unnatural in the antagonism of rail and water operators or rail and water shippers toward each other, their interests being primarily involved in their own profitable operations, it is recognized that these interests cannot be expected to coincide with each other nor with the interests of the country at large. For that reason it requires long practice and familiarity with the problem to sift the testimony for facts bearing on the distribution of savings in transportation charges. The War Department's findings indicate clearly that savings on inland-waterway transportation are sufficiently general and widely enough distributed to be counted as public benefits. The War Department's endeavor has been concentrated on determining in each case whether there is an actual net economic benefit to be distributed.

Regulation of joint rail and water rates and its effect on the public interest

In the hearings before congressional committees there were repeated assurances, both official and otherwise, that regulation of all forms of transportation by the same agency would insure equal treatment, and that the natural advantages of each form would not be nullified. It is felt that the committee is entitled to the experience of the War Department with respect to such regulation as applies under existing statutes. Although the War Department has recommended unfavorably on the majority of proposed improvements, the district officers and the Board of Engineers, after thorough study of the engineering and economic aspects of certain waterway projects, have frequently found and so reported that the prospective savings to the public in cost of transportation so far outweighed the cost of improvements that the improvements were justified. In many such cases it has happened that after the completion of a project the prospective water-borne tonnage has not developed or its development has been unduly retarded because the competing rail carriers have been granted relief from the long-and-short-haul clause. Also, where the anticipated traffic has been of the combined rail-water character, thus putting the joint rates directly under rail regulation, the water portion of the rates have been set by the regulatory commission, not on a basis related to the water carriers' operating cost or the distance by water, but on a fixed differential of from 10 to 20 percent below the rail rate between ports. This manner of regulation has apparently prevented the formation of common-carrier barge lines and has prevented the interior shippers from realizing the full economies for which the waterways were provided. It has also undoubtedly prevented a large volume of tonnage from seeking the waterways, which could use them to the real profit and advantage of both shipper and carrier. This experience with regulation by agencies not historically closely identified with waterway problems causes apprehension on our part that the further extension of regulatory powers in the bills passed by the House and Senate would not be in the public interest.

Independent regulation of water transportation

It is fully realized that the need for improving the transportation situation is acute and that there is no simple solution for the problem ready at hand. It is essential to realize that water transportation is unlike all other forms of carriage. It is the aggregate of thousands of small independent operators on the inland waterways which gives the character, furnishes the natural regulation, and automatically enforces the fair practices required in this type of transport. But it cannot sustain for long destructive competition. The remarkable fact is not that there is so little waterborne tonnage but that so large a volume actually seeks the waterways in the face of the most determined efforts to prevent it. The fact seems to be that maintenance of competitive rates below cost by the railroads has proved more disastrous for them than for their competitors, and now they seek to have such unsound business judgment transformed into wisdom by legislation. The regulation provided in the bills could be employed so as to paralyze inland waterways and the industries dependent upon them. Testimony before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce stressed the unsoundness of relating water rates to the present rail rate structure and thus depriving the public of such economies as are made possible through the use of waterways. It insisted on the soundness of regulating water rates with a view to the needs and the potentialities of water transportation. The free flow of specially adapted tonnage should be permitted to reach and use the waterways unhampered to the end that commerce may move in increased volume at the lowest possible cost. It is believed that such steps would be in the interests of the taxpayers, the shippers, and the carriers themselves.

Respectfully submitted.

Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 28, 1940.

The Honorable JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BAILEY: Under date of February 16, 1940, in response to a request from you, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Chairman of the Maritime Commission addressed to you, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, a joint letter, in which these Government officials express their disapproval of so much of S. 2009, now in conference, as relates to the regulation of the rates and services of common and contract carriers by water.

The views of these gentlemen are well known since, as pointed out in the opening paragraph of their letter, they have previously favored the Congress with their opinion. Under date of June 20, 1939, Secretary Woodring, in a letter to Chairman LEA of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which letter fills five columns of fine print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, went fully into his reasons for disapproving the regulation of water carriers. On July 17, 1939, Secretary Wallace, in a lengthy letter to Speaker BANKHEAD, advanced the views which he reiterates in his letter to you of February 16, 1940. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 24, 1939, at page 8596, et seq., appears a statement from Admiral Land which, with the accompanying tables, covers seven columns of the RECORD. In these letters and statements will be found substantially all the arguments that are now advanced against water-carrier regulation.

In spite of these arguments, the Senate, on May 25, 1939, passed S. 2009, with the water-carrier regulation feature therein, by a vote of 70 to 6, with 20 Senators recorded as not voting. On July 26, 1939, this bill, with water-carrier regulating provisions similar to the Senate bill, passed the House by a vote of 273 to 99, with 10 Members paired and 44 Members recorded as not voting. Now, after both Senate and House have overwhelmingly recorded their support of this feature of the bill, these high Government officials come forward with a renewed assault upon sections of the bill that present no serious differences to the conferees.

On September 20, 1938, the President of the United States, mindful of the serious nature of the railroad problem, appointed a committee of three railroad executives and three railroad labor executives to consider and make recommendations as to what could be done, by way of legislation, to improve the situation of the railroads, recognized by everyone as essential to the public welfare.

After careful consideration, on December 23, 1938, the committee made an extended report, embodying its conclusions and recommendations. The keynote of the report was the necessity for equality of opportunity. Among other things, the committeemen unanimously suggested that all forms of transportation should be subjected to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body which for 50 years has enjoyed the utmost of public confidence. This letter is presented on behalf of the surviving members of this committee by a representative of each of the groups.

We respectfully submit that, in opposing this legislation, the distinguished gentlemen who signed the letter of February 16, 1940, are not in accord with the most enlightened public opinion.

In his message to the Congress bearing date of June 7, 1935, President Roosevelt said:

"Another bill for the regulation of intercoastal and coastwise trade and of some of the inland-waterway carriers prepared by the Coordinator has been introduced and is before the Congress for action. I recommend that this bill be considered by the appropriate committees and pressed to early passage. I can see no reason why the responsibility for the regulation of intercoastal, coastwise, and inland waterways should not be vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission."

In a radio address from the White House on April 28, 1935, President Roosevelt said, among other things:

"There is need for legislation providing for the regulation of interstate transportation by bus and trucks, to regulate transportation by water, new provisions for strengthening our merchant marine and air transport, measures for the strengthening of the Interstate Commerce Commission to enable it to carry out a rounded conception of the Nation's transportation system in which the benefits of private ownership are retained while the public stake in these important services is protected by the public's Government."

These views of the Chief Executive of the Nation are supported by repeated utterances of the Interstate Commerce Commission, one as late as January 29, 1940, and by the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, who is chiefly responsible for the provisions of S. 2009 dealing with this subject.

At a time when the Inland Waterways Corporation was subject to the control of the War Department, its then president, Maj. Gen. T. Q. Ashburn, testifying before the Senate committee on April 11, 1939, when this very bill was under consideration, said:

"So far as Senate bill 2009 is concerned, I have read it over very carefully. I think it will accomplish all that it is intended to accomplish, and I think it is a good bill."

Again, at the same hearing, there occurred the following colloquy:

"The CHAIRMAN. * * * There has been testimony before this committee that if this bill passes, regulating water carriers on the Mississippi River, it will put the water carriers out of business. Do you have any such fears of that, or do you think that will be the result?

"General ASHBURN. I have no fear at all of that; and I think they ought to be regulated."

At this same hearing before the Senate committee, Mr. Harry C. Ames, representing the Mississippi Valley Barge Line Co., a privately owned carrier on the Mississippi, on April 12, 1939, used this language:

"And on behalf of that company I desire to go on record as saying that we are not opposed to regulation; in fact, we favor regulation which will bear equally and protect equally all forms of transportation."

Many other similar expressions from representatives of substantial water carriers could be cited. Their view is well expressed by Mr. Edward P. Farley, chairman of the executive committee of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. and former chairman of the United States Shipping Board, who, in a statement bearing date of February 14, 1940, advocated the passage of this bill. In that statement he points out that 12 years ago there appeared on behalf of the owners of nine domestic fleets, representing the great preponderance of tonnage in domestic common-carrier service, a brief in support of unified regulation. Near the end of his illuminating statement, Mr. Farley says:

"The claim that regulation of water rates by the I. C. C. would result in favoritism to the railroads is an unfair indictment of the intellectual integrity of the members of the Commission. No charges of unfairness or discrimination have been sustained in all the long life of the Commission."

In that part of the letter of February 16, 1940, obviously prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture, language is used that may convey the impression that the farmers of the country are united in their opposition to the bill. But if such is the belief of the Secretary, he is misinformed. In a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on July 14, 1939, the Honorable JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, of Pennsylvania, enumerated numerous important farm organizations throughout the country that support the bill. With great deference, we respectfully submit that the Secretary of Agriculture does not speak for the best interests of the farmers when he opposes the regulation of water carriers. Indeed, his argument reads like a special pleading strained to support a view adopted before the subject had been carefully examined.

His argument is far more potent as against the regulation of truck rates than water rates, particularly when he says:

"The investment in trucks, and frequently in water equipment, is relatively small, and most of the costs of these carriers, especially of the motor carriers, vary directly with traffic."

And yet commercial transport on the highways has been regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission since 1935, and no one seriously proposes the repeal of the Motor Carrier Act.

The Secretary does not assert that water transport directly benefits the farmer, since it is well established that his products do not move by water until he has parted with their ownership, and equally well established that he gets little or no benefit from low water rates paid by those who sell to him his necessary oil, machinery, and other supplies. As has been pointed out more than once in the debates on this bill, most of those who use the waterways add the rail rate to the selling price, whatever may be the undisclosed rate which they pay for water transportation.

As Senator REED emphatically stated on the floor of the Senate on May 22, 1939, when the bill was under discussion:

"I am saying that nobody has ever been able to point out how any benefit has been derived by a farmer in the State of Kansas from the water rate."

The Secretary of Agriculture insists that rail rates on agricultural products should be reduced. Yet he points out that under the present system the railroad tendency is to lower competitive rates and make up their losses by placing "high rates on noncompetitive traffic, of which a significant proportion consists of agricultural products, to make up their revenue deficiencies on the competition-compelled reduced rates." It does not seem to have occurred to the Secretary that when all rates, rail and water, are under regulation, such a practice can be controlled by the regulating body.

In that part of the letter of February 16 manifestly attributable to the Maritime Commission, it is said that measured by revenue tonnage, the intercoastal water carriers transported only 3.6 percent of the total tonnage of seven principal Western railroads. Such a statement is very misleading. The average rail haul is about 350 miles and the haul of the traffic moved by these intercoastal water carriers, if moved by rail, would be probably eight times as great as the average rail haul. Instead of 3.6 percent representing the relative importance of rail and water carriers, the figure would be nearer eight times the precentage stated in the letter.

The Maritime Commission is concededly a promotional organization. That by its very nature it is a partisan body no one can successfully deny. Its efforts to retain control over the rates and services of the water carriers grows out of its obvious purpose to encourage water transport, without regard to the interest of other agencies of transportation equally essential to the public welfare. This Commission, if we may say so without offense, loses sight of the transportation picture as a whole, and unintentionally disregards the welfare of those millions of our citizens who must depend upon land transportation for their very existence.

It is a little difficult to appreciate the interest of the Secretary of War in this matter. The bill does not deal with waterway extensions or the amount of money which shall be expended thereon.

Some complaint is made because the railroads upon occasion lower their rates to meet water competition, a tendency which would obviously be checked by regulating both types of transportation. The Secretary of War quotes from the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission to show that the rail carriers have reduced their rates voluntarily since 1922. One may well inquire, So what? If this is a disorderly process, should it not be corrected? And will not full regulation help to correct it?

The Secretary speaks with commendable pride of the work of his traffic specialists. But these gentlemen often lose sight of the larger aspects of the question, as the recent report of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the proposed Lake Erie-Ohio River Canal conclusively demonstrates. This report, it should be stated, was made in response to a request by the President of the United States.

The letter, viewed as a whole, is based on various unsound assumptions. As an example, on page 17 occurs the statement: "All the provisions of the bills seem designed to free the railroads from restraints and obligations while imposing restrictions on their water competitors and making it more expensive for the public to move freight." It is only by the exercise of restraint that one can treat such a statement without display of impatience.

Surely the author of this paragraph has never read the bill. Nowhere are the railroads freed of restraint and obligations. If the eminent authors of this letter are really anxious to bring about equality, and if they favor accomplishing this end by leaving water rates unregulated, while at the same time relaxing rail regulation, why not repeal the long-and-short-haul clause, the prohibition in the law against ownership and control of water lines by railroads, and that section of the act that compels railroads to join in joint rates with the water lines?

Certain fundamental propositions are perfectly clear. The country must have a transportation system that can function in an orderly manner. The public is entitled to select that system that is most convenient and economical. Each mode of transportation has certain inherent advantages. These natural advantages should not be enhanced by artificial Government favoritism.

All forms should be equally regulated, equally taxed, and treated equally in the matter of subsidies. This bill is a step in the right direction, so far as regulation is concerned. The railroads and their employees are asking only for equality; they seek to destroy no one; they invoke the principle of fair dealing and common justice.

If the proprieties will permit, we respectfully ask that this letter be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very respectfully,

E. E. NORRIS,
President, Southern Railway.
B. M. JEWELL,
President, Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L.,
Members, Committee appointed by the President.

SEVEN YEARS UNDER ROOSEVELT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this day marks the seventh anniversary of the inauguration of Franklin D. Roosevelt as President of the United States.

Throughout the Nation today millions of Americans who are not interested in or agitated primarily by political controversies but who nevertheless entertain a consuming interest in the welfare of our people and our institutions, will be surveying in their minds these 7 years and attempting to assess their contribution to the political, moral, social, and economic development of our generation.

In common with them, and in pursuance of both my inclination and my duty, I have been attempting to survey and assess these years in the light of the incontrovertible conditions which produced them, and the measure of success with which these conditions were met and mastered.

In doing this I have sought, insofar as my limitations and my acknowledged partiality would permit, to insulate myself from the type of narrow partisanship which claims all virtue for itself and denies it to all others.

The 7 years through which we have been living have been unique years for our country and for the world. Problems so baffling and stupendous, so intimately interwoven with our individual and collective lives, and yet so far-reaching in their effect upon our present and future outlook as a people, have arisen at every turn of the road and at every step we have taken that the wonder is not so much that we have traveled so far and accomplished so much but that we did not surrender to the inexorable fate which all pessimists announced had overtaken us.

We live in a world that refuses to be stationary. We live in a world that is peopled by seething billions of human souls, who, if possessed of normal instincts, are striving for a better world and for a better place in that world for themselves and for their children.

In the effort to obtain that goal, clashes of personal interests, of group interests, of racial interests, of national and international interests, are inevitable; and these clashes leave their scars upon the face and upon the heart of humanity in our day, just as they have done in all the ages of man's history.

In the effort to bring some form of order out of the resulting chaos, to clear away the debris which has choked the channels of progress, and to coordinate the moral and intellectual strength of the masses whose faces were set toward the goal of their aspirations, governments have been ordained. Sometimes they have been imposed upon the people by brutal and ruthless methods. Sometimes they have been set up by the people themselves, based upon the inalienable right of every human being who submits to authority to have a voice in its creation.

It is my purpose today to speak, in brief but comprehensive outline, of this 7-year period carved from the history of the latter type of government to which I have referred, the United States of America.

Any commentator, no matter how experienced, confronts a difficult task when he seeks to measure the stature of a contemporary. The task becomes doubly difficult when he seeks to appraise a contemporary whose greatest test is still before him.

Recently I reread some lines written by a distinguished journalist. He was appraising a man on the eve of his inauguration as President of the United States. I quote his appraisal:

> A man of good heart and good intention, he is not firm. The times demand a Jackson.

The name of the journalist was Henry Villard, and the name of the man thus appraised was Abraham Lincoln.

Remembering our own repeated failures in the art of accurate appraisal, we may temper our judgments concerning any man who has failed at prophecy concerning the ability and achievements of another. But if we are fair, which connotes the element of justice, we should be able to recognize, and admit, the greatness of a man on the basis of a record of undisputed achievement, even though that man be our contemporary, and even though some of those who indulge in the appraisement may differ from him on some or many proposals or positions. So today I feel that we are justified in pausing here for a brief period to pay tribute to a man who will be honored by countless generations of Americans yet unborn, and to a record made by him and those who have labored with him in behalf of the American people.

No President since, or save, Lincoln has faced so grave a crisis in our poltical life as did President Roosevelt on that gray day of March 4, 1933, when he took the oath of office as President of the United States. Because we are prone to forget dangers when they have disappeared, let me briefly recall the conditions which faced him and the country on that historic day.

During a period of depression which had existed for nearly 3 years, the industrial machinery of the Nation had been slowing down until it had practically reached a standstill. To use a quotation which is rolled as a sweet morsel under the tongues of Republican candidates for President, "The economic system had stalled on dead center."

Millions of wage earners—estimated at between thirteen and fifteen millions—dismissed because their employers had no work for them to do, were in a state of despair over the question of reemployment. Those who were fortunate enough to have any left were living on their savings. Then came the final disaster—the epidemic of bank failures. Slowly at first—one here, one yonder, scarcely noticed by those who were vainly seeking jobs, banks had been failing throughout the country.

Then more and more of them collapsed, each weakened link in the chain dragging down still others. Suddenly the whole Nation awoke to the danger. A great wave of panic swept across the country. Men and women beat against bank doors, fought each other and fought those stationed there as guards, in a fruitless effort to enter those closed banks and withdraw their precious savings. When they were turned away, they went, with white faces and dazed expressions, to stand in bread lines. And in those lengthening bread lines there was muttering and omnious threats and imprecations.

This was the picture which confronted Franklin D. Roosevelt when he took the oath of office on March 4, 1933. These were the problems which he was called upon to face and solve, if possible, to prevent Americans from starving, and to prevent the possible destruction of all for which our forefathers had so earnestly striven.

There were able and honorable men and women who doubted the ability of Mr. Roosevelt to deal with this situation. As in the preinaugural appraisal of Lincoln, to which I have referred, Roosevelt was given credit for good intentions, but he, too, was believed to lack firmness. "He does not possess sufficient experience or decision" chanted the soothsayers.

The manner in which he confounded these gloomy predictions is now as definite and important a part of our national history as are the acts of Lincoln.

THE BANKING SITUATION

Roosevelt's first official act as President was to close the banks in order to preserve them from hysterical runs which threatened even the strongest institutions, and in order to provide a period of examination and reorganization. The promptness and decisiveness with which this action was taken is generally conceded to have saved the banking structure, if not indeed the entire financial structure of the Nation. But this emergency action was not sufficient. The President had not forgotten the plight of millions of panic-stricken depositors. It was essential that this tragedy be not repeated, and in order to make sure that it should not be repeated, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was created.

In the 4 years preceding the inauguration of President Roosevelt, there were 6,035 bank suspensions in the United States. This figure does not include 3,413 banks which could not reopen following the bank holiday. Since the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has been in operation the number of bank failures has been reduced to an average of 51 per year. When a member bank fails, under this law the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation takes charge of the bank and takes charge of its reorganization, if it is to be reorganized, and attempts to salvage as much as possible of its assets for the stockholders and depositors. All deposits not in excess of $5,000 are guaranteed, as we all know.

When the record of the Roosevelt administration is finally appraised in the cool but penetrating light of history, it is my opinion that special emphasis will be placed upon his efforts to follow emergency action with long-range planning, and that the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation will be regarded as typical of this characteristic.

RELIEF

However, back in 1933, before any movement could be made toward long-range planning for future protection and conservation, there were many emergencies which had to be coped with, first of which was relief for the hungry unemployed. The President had promised in his inaugural address that none should starve, and in order that this pledge be kept he asked Congress for an appropriation of $3,300,000,000, which was promptly granted. This first Emergency Relief Act was approved on March 31, 1933, less than 1 month after President Roosevelt had been inaugurated. It provided not only direct relief, through grants-in-aid to the States, but for such other emergency measures as were deemed necessary.

By the summer of 1933 the Federal Emergency Relief Administration was employing a million and a half persons on local relief projects.

THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

In the meantime, on April 5, 1933, just 1 month after he assumed office, the President created the Civilian Conservation Corps, to provide for the employment of thousands of young men between the ages of 17 and 23 who found themselves without employment and without prospects, and who were in imminent danger of yielding to the temptations of crime in the absence of jobs. Since that date more than 2,500,000 young men have been enrolled in the Civilian Conservation Corps. While this organization was created to meet an emergency situation, the work which has been done by the enrollees has proven to be, and will continue to be, of such lasting value to the country that there is almost universal demand that this activity be made permanent.

Notable among their accomplishments has been the planting of one and a half billion trees on waste lands throughout the country, the development of recreational facilities in National and State forests and parks, the planning and construction of wildlife sanctuaries, the conservation of soil resources on 13,000,000 acres of farm and grazing lands, and the spectacular aid which they have rendered to the Nation in fighting floods and forest fires.

In terms of human values, which cannot be ignored in any appraisal of these past 7 years, it is impossible to estimate the benefit derived from the Civilian Conservation Corps. These young men, many of whom might have become enemies of organized society, were returned to private life stronger and better physically and mentally, and with the aid of useful training they had received were able to take their places as valuable, self-respecting, and self-supporting citizens.

RELIEF FOR INDUSTRY

Having kept his pledge to provide immediate relief for the destitute, the President turned his attention and directed the attention of Congress and the country to ailing industry. Hungry men and women and children must have food, but men wanted and sought jobs, and until industry began again to function he realized and the country realized that there could be no genuine recovery. The first step in this direction was the creation of the Public Works Administration, approved on June 16, 1933.

In the first half of 1933 factories producing durable goods of all kinds had employed only 44 percent as many men as in 1929, lumber mills about 45 percent of their 1929 crews, cement mills about 44 percent, and steel mills about 54 percent; and many of those still employed were working on shorter hours.

The President realized, and all of us realized, that the Federal Government could not hope to reemploy on public works the six and one-half million skilled workmen who had from 1922 to 1930 participated in the largest construction boom the country had ever known. The objective sought to be accomplished by the creation of the Public Works Administration was the building of projects that would not compete with the products of private industry, but would stimulate additional purchases, and thus further the employment of labor.

These Public Works Administration projects have called for more than $2,000,000,000 worth of materials. Some of these have been basic; some have been finished products. The orders for these materials were placed in and filled from every State in the Union. It has been determined that for every 2 hours of employment given at the site of construction 5 hours have been generated in factories, industrial plants, mills manufacturing materials, and on transportation lines shipping the supplies to the site of construction. All of these men employed as a result of Public Works Administration contract awards have worked, not for the Government but for private enterprises, at prevailing wages and under working conditions common to American workingmen. In other words, the purpose for which the Public Works Administration was created has been fulfilled. It has done its part in reducing unemployment and in reviving private industry.

At the same time and as a complementary effort to stimulate industry the National Industrial Recovery Administration was launched. Whatever may have been said about this venture, even its bitterest foes, if they are fair men who remember that tragic period, should admit the tremendous psychological lift which the creation of this organization gave to a nation still under the spell of consuming fear. At last something was being done to relieve the situation. There was a great upsurge of hope, which found expression in triumphal parades down every Main Street in the land. And after the parades were over there was a revival of buying, which stimulated employment in a widening circle from stores to factories. Though this organization was stricken down by a decision of the courts, this great upsurge of hope, this revival of buying, and stimulation of employment cannot be said to have been in vain. And it is possible that when the historians come to consider the National Recovery Administration they may give it a place among the more important acts of the Roosevelt administration, because it constituted our first effective national attempt to control child labor.

RELIEF FOR AGRICULTURE

While considering the most pressing problems confronting the Nation during those early months of his administration, the President and his coworkers did not forget the farmer, whose plight had become desperate. The loss of farm purchasing power was forcing thousands of farmers to default on short-term, high-rate mortgages, as well as on their long-term obligations. From various sections of the country had come reports of embattled farmers, usually the most law-abiding of citizens, banding together to use shotguns to stop foreclosures on their homes.

To meet this situation the Federal Government provided emergency resources which enabled the national farm-loan associations and the Federal land banks to undertake a farm-debt refinancing program. In 3 years a total of more than $3,000,000,000 was loaned by the land banks and the Land Bank Commissioner.

This farm-debt refinancing not only helped to arrest Nation-wide farm-mortgage foreclosures and leave the farmer on his land, without which he is totally at sea, but provided mortgage funds at interest rates and on terms of payment more in line with the farmer's ability to pay. As a result, the rate of farm foreclosures dropped from 38.8 per thousand farms in 1933 to 20.3 per thousand farms in 1936, and to 13.4 in 1939, which is the lowest rate on record. Furthermore, most of the farmers with Federal land bank and Commissioner loans have reduced substantially the principal of their indebtedness in the past few years, and in some instances have repaid their mortgages in full.

The mortgage-debt refinancing program was but one of three farm programs inaugurated in the early months of 1933. All those interested in the permanent solution of the agricultural problem realized that such a program as I have described would relieve the situation for only a brief span of years unless some measure of adjustment were made to reduce the disparity between the prices farmers were receiving for farm products and the prices that were being paid for goods purchased.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 sought to aid, if not to accomplish, this adjustment. The immediate aim was to adjust production of those agricultural products for which foreign markets no longer existed. By limiting production of market demands, farm prices rose, and the national industrial recovery was hastened through increased farm purchases of factory products. To aid such adjustment, payments were made to farmers who cooperated in the curtailment of crops which were being overproduced from the standpoint of satisfactory markets.

Realizing, however, that farmers whose barns and granaries were already filled with surplus crops could not benefit immediately from such a program, and that market prices would still be affected by such surpluses, the third of the emergency farm programs was inaugurated. By Executive order, the Commodity Credit Corporation was formed. This agency, through loans to producers, finances the carrying and orderly marketing of such crops as wheat, cotton, corn, and tobacco. This temporary measure has enabled farmers to hold their crops until both consumer and industrial demands have created and stimulated profitable markets.

FURTHER AIDS TO BUSINESS

While setting up new machinery to function in fields where it had been entirely lacking, the President also acted promptly in taking advantage of machinery already in existence, and, by providing adequate funds and organization, increasing its scope and usefulness. This was true in the case of both the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Home Loan Bank System, which were created in the latter days of the Hoover administration.

Beginning with an act of Congress, approved March 9, 1933, the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have been increased from time to time and the scope of its operations extended to provide necessary emergency financing facilities for financial institutions, to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, to purchase preferred stock, capital notes, or debentures of banks, trust companies, and insurance companies, and to make loans as prescribed by law.

AIDS TO HOME OWNERSHIP

In order to cope with the plight of urban home owners, who were losing their homes through foreclosure of mortgages at the rate of a thousand per day, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was created June 13, 1933. This organization provided long-term, low-rate interest loans for the first time in the history of the home mortgage field. The refinancing opportunities it offered saved both home owners and mortgage holders. When the Home Owners' Loan Corporation terminated its loaning operations in 1936 it had made 1,017,827 loans in the amount of $3,093,450,641. More than $200,000,000 have been saved by home owners through concessions obtained through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation from the holders of mortgages. In addition, these same home owners have saved approximately $175,000,000 in interest charges as a result of the lower rate at which their obligations were refinanced. And, most important of all, their homes were saved, their hearthstones, and their firesides were preserved for them and their stake in our form of organized society was vouchsafed to them and to us.

The Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended by the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and subsequent amendments, has continued in operation the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, an administrative and regulatory body whose duties are to establish and regulate the 12 Federal Home Loan banks, to charter and regulate Federal savings and loan associations, to administer the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and to operate the Federal Savings and Loan Corporation.

These acts, to which I have just referred, constitute the answer of the Roosevelt administration to the demand for immediate action in the emergency which confronted the Nation on March 4, 1933. These were the acts of the man who, like Lincoln, was said to lack firmness and decision. And how long did it take to get these emergency measures, with their immediate, constructive, and long-range benefits into operation? It required less than 6 months.

On September 6, 1933, Oswald Garrison Villard, son of Henry Villard, who doubted Lincoln's firmness, wrote that "even the first 6 months of Wilson's war administration were not so momentous, so far as legislation is concerned as the first 6 months of President Roosevelt's tenure of office." Villard commended the President for "his unbounded courage and self-confidence" which have "helped to ease the national stress and to change American mentality." But Villard, like various other commentators, was still haunted by doubts and fears. He concluded with the warning that the President's severest tests were yet before him. Even with this fine record, it appeared that Roosevelt had not yet proved himself. Let us see, therefore, how he met the tests which were to come.

BROADER MEASURES FOR THE FUTURE

He had kept his pledge to provide immediate relief for the needy, had set up instruments to save homes, farms, banks, businesses, large and small, to stimulate employment and production, and to speed recovery. While attending to the emergency needs of the Nation he was concentrating on laying the firm foundation for a sound and lasting recovery. But he and his advisers and coworkers were looking even beyond immediate recovery. He did not feel that it was enough to save a man from drowning and leave him on the bank, weak and exhausted, with a lively chance that tides beyond his control might again roll in and engulf him. He had in mind certain safeguards which needed to be established for the good of the whole people. He realized, as we all realize, that there were certain abuses which should be wiped out, and that the only agency which could bring about these needed reforms was the Federal Government.

And so we find him moving from that first emergency phase of his administration into a new phase with a double and determined purpose, namely, not only to bring about recovery but to effect long-needed reforms. There were still, however, pressing matters which required attention, which related to emergency and were essential to recovery. First on the list in this category was a decision in relation to the gold standard.

GOLD-STANDARD LEGISLATION

In 1933 more than 30 foreign nations had abandoned the gold standard or taken other steps to reduce the foreign exchange value of their currencies. As foreign currencies declined in value the prices of American products rose in foreign markets. As a result our foreign trade was rapidly disappearing. The effects of this loss were being felt throughout the country and had contributed materially to prolonging the depression.

Our own currency was out of line with the new world level. We were faced with the alternative of adjusting our own price level, by reducing the gold content of the dollar, or losing the remainder of our world trade. It would have been the height of folly, if not economic suicide, for us to have taken any course other than that which we took. So, in January 1934, we reduced the gold content of the dollar to 59.06, but the gold dollar is still the standard of value under the laws of the United States, not only within the United States but it has come to be the standard of value in almost all the markets of the world.

The wisdom of this step and its immediate benefits are demonstrated by the fact that in 1934 our exports of finished manufactured products increased 37 percent, and exports of semifinished products increased 47 percent, compared with 1932, before the change of the gold content of the dollar. In domestic trade the 59.06 dollar purchased practically as much as before. The soundness of our money has in no wise been affected; and the shouts of the alarmists that this step would lead to further devaluation and eventually inflation have, like so many other alarms, turned out to be entirely unfounded.

The adjustment of our currency to meet world conditions paved the way for the launching of the Federal trade-agreements program in June 1934. I shall refer later to these agreements and their effect in reviving our vanishing export trade and recovery generally, but I desire now to mention two of the major safeguards sponsored and accomplished by the Roosevelt administration during the first half of his first term.

CORPORATE SECURITIES AND THE STOCK MARKET

With the 1929 stock-market crash still ringing in the ears of the people, and with stricken investors left with volumes of worthless papers called securities, afraid to invest again even when they had the money for investment, it was deemed essential to establish an agency which would not only prevent a recurrence of this disaster, but would restore confidence to the people. For this purpose the Securities and Exchange Commission was established in June 1934. The authority and duties of the Commission have since been increased by the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 and the Bankruptcy Act, as amended in 1938. The value of this Commission and the service which it has rendered are now generally admitted by those who most fiercely fought its creation at the beginning.

SOCIAL SECURITY

In the matter of safeguards sponsored by the President and by Congress, the one which undoubtedly provides the greatest good for the greatest number of our people is the Social Security Act of 1935. At his unrelenting insistence we have at last made provision for old-age insurance and unemployment compensation, in addition to which, under this act, the Federal Government now joins with the States in providing care for the aged, for dependent children, and for the blind. The United States is one of the last great nations to inaugurate such a program.

If the record of the Roosevelt administration had included no other acts beyond the two measures just cited, Franklin D. Roosevelt would be entitled to take his place among our greatest Presidents. But these are only two among a multiplied number of constructive and beneficial measures. These two, among many others, were accomplished before his first term had run little more than half its course.

During this same brief period the Federal Housing Administration had been created, to stimulate the construction of better housing facilities, as well as the construction industry and all its allied branches, by encouraging and helping to finance renovation and new home building through the insurance of loans and mortgages. In another important industrial field the Federal Communications Commission had been established to bring some order out of the chaotic conditions surrounding the various means of communication.

In the accomplishment of these tasks, Mr. Roosevelt and his administration had not been able to please everybody in the United States. Before the half-way point in his first term had been reached, on March 4, 1935, signs of recovery were to be seen on every hand. Within these 2 years the index of business activity had risen from 60 to 87 percent of an estimated normal. But with signs of returning prosperity there came also criticism. Ironically, but perhaps inevitably, this criticism was led by some of the very men who had come to Roosevelt in the early days of March 1933 imploring him to rescue business even if it were necessary for the Government to take it over and operate it. They had received assistance when on the flat of their backs, but when business was improving and they thought they needed the doctor no longer, they demanded to be let alone, forgetful of those who still needed help; forgetful of the necessary reforms to avoid recurring disasters. Their position was that what had been done was all that was necessary for a quick recovery, and that the future might take care of itself. They were joined in their outcry by some of the newspapers. Here are two typical excerpts from editorials of that period:

The New York Herald Tribune of March 4, 1935, said:

> The country cannot stand and, in our opinion, is resolved against any more hasty experiments or destructive reforms. It asks for an end to threats to business, to investors, to the taxpayer, to the dollar. * * * President Roosevelt captured the affection of his fellow citizens in the early months of his term. Can he now regain their confidence by displaying restraint, fairness, and good judgment in the real test that lies ahead?

The Detroit (Mich.) Free Press, of February 24, 1935, said:

> The biggest single cause of apprehension, among informed and careful people with a knowledge of governmental and economic laws, at present is uncertainty about the leadership of the President. Not about his intention, but about his wisdom and capacity as a pilot.

Some of the headlines were:

> Magic touch gone—Criticism piles high.
> F. D. R.'s second year finds him slipping, after first triumphs of his office.
> Let-down in morale of official Washington, with corresponding loss of popularity throughout Nation.
> Crisis faces President at half-way mark.

Mr. Franklyn Waltman, Jr., who is now busy trying to revive confidence in a certain national political party which shall be nameless, wrote in the Washington Post on March 3, 1935:

> Completing his second year in the White House today, President Roosevelt is confronted with the task of getting the New Deal off a dead center and reviving the confidence of the country in it and him.

Further on in the article Mr. Waltman magnanimously admits that:

> Mr. Roosevelt * * * can take comfort in much that he has achieved—stabilization of the banking structure; an increase in farm income; a higher price level generally; improvement of working conditions in many industries; industrial production which approximates 90 percent of the 1923–25 average; increased wages on the whole for those working and, in comparative proportion, an even greater increase in corporation profits.

Once again we quote Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard in an article in which he appraised the President under the heading "Roosevelt in midchannel." This comment occurred on March 2, 1935:

> So there the President is: A gallant, fine-spirited, philanthropically minded gentleman, eager to do what is right, achieving much that is good, and, it is to be hoped, lasting, but still slipping steadily.

AIDS TO YOUTH

All of these threats, warnings, and dire predictions failed to deter the President in his determination to consummate a program which he believed beneficial to the country as a whole. Within a month after these criticisms were published the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 was approved, providing relief and work relief, and increasing employment throughout the country by providing for useful projects. Two months later, by Executive order, the President created the National Youth Administration to assist students in continuing their education, to provide work for needy unemployed young people, and to establish a program of guidance and placement to assist young people in finding regular employment. In July 1935 the Wagner Labor Relations Act was enacted and the National Labor Relations Board was created, guaranteeing to all employees the right to full freedom in self-organization and in the designation of representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of collective bargaining.

LEGISLATION FOR LABOR

It is probable that Roosevelt's continued demand for the consideration of the rights of labor has brought upon him more violent criticism than any of his other policies. In this great program, however, the President has been a pioneer and has not only been compelled, but has been willing, to take the consequences. That he did not receive as complete cooperation as might have been desired from the groups whose rights he championed is regrettable. But it should not be forgotten by us, and will not be overlooked by later students of this period, that labor has gone through a particularly difficult phase of its development.

In one sense of the word, and in the light of history, this period may be properly compared to the reconstruction era following the Civil War, when the righting of old wrongs through emancipation led to a period of turmoil before the ultimate adjustment was accomplished under our American way of life. That a satisfactory and beneficial adjustment of these situations will be effected, I have the utmost confidence.

In the meantime, the machinery for orderly collective bargaining has been established, and as time moves on this machinery will undoubtedly be perfected so as to function more adequately and effectively. In addition to the National Labor Relations Board, safeguards for labor have been provided in the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938; in the Social Security Administration; in the Maritime Labor Board; and in the Railroad Retirement Board, as well as the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, in the adjustment of controversies upon our great transportation systems.

As President Roosevelt continued to advance this program along the paths which seemed to be best, and as the 1936 election drew closer, the chant of criticism—led by some of those who had been unable to remove their yachts from drydocks and reopen their country homes—rose to a veritable roar. If Roosevelt were reelected, we were solemnly assured that our constitutional system would collapse and all that we had gained in a century and a half of national history would be lost. But the great masses of American people had not been blind nor deaf nor dumb. They knew what was going on in this country and in the world. From the taxi driver and the ditch digger to the most powerful industrialist and professional adviser, the people had begun to realize a new relationship between them and their Government. For them the President had met all the tenets which had disturbed the soothsayers, as they proved in unmistakable fashion on the third day of November 1936.

What happened? What is the truth about the so-called Roosevelt ruin, with stories of which we were regaled? I quote from a few newspaper clippings which appeared in various newspapers shortly after the election in 1936.

The first is from the Baltimore Sun which, though traditionally Democratic, had refused to support Mr. Roosevelt for reelection. The date is November 8, 1936, and the headline reads:

> Roosevelt sweep unleashes buying; clearing of political uncertainties starts dividend flood; approval of policies at polls boosts commodities and Government bonds.

The Philadelphia Record of the same date carried the following statement issued by the brokerage firm of Weingarten & Co., New York:

> A broad uptrend in the market has developed since the Presidential election of Tuesday last. Looked at calmly, this is not surprising. For the reelection of President Roosevelt means that no readjustment is to occur and that his policies, which brought about business recovery, are not to be interrupted. As a matter of fact, the market's strength is best explained by pondering what would have occurred if the Republicans had triumphed on Tuesday.

And the New York Evening Post of November 7, 1936, ran a Washington dispatch under the somewhat surprising headline:

Chamber of commerce shakes off New Deal bogey, admits progress; bitter foe of Roosevelt policies discovers that business is better and the outlook bright.

So it transpired that after all this country had not been ruined and Roosevelt moved into his second term. But his critics, though overwhelmingly defeated at the polls, did not give up the fight. Their fangs were still poisonous and active. The subsequent months proved to be among the most trying of his administration since they included the business recession of the summer of 1937.

This recession resulted primarily from an effort on the part of the President to test the soundness of the claim being made by certain elements of the business community that a sharp reduction in Government expenditures for relief would stimulate private industry and business. We know now that this theory was exploded by the results.

It is but fair to give the President credit for the fact that, although this business recession came much more swiftly than the major depression of the early 1930's, his foresight in recommending and the foresight of Congress in setting up the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation prevented a repetition of the epidemic of bank failures and the inevitable panic which would have followed 1937 as it followed 1929.

AMERICAN SOLIDARITY

Notwithstanding the recession of 1937, which has long since given way to a renewed recovery, President Roosevelt went steadily on in the pursuit of his program.

With world conditions growing progressively ominous, with all Europe forming into a series of armed camps, and with the fear of daily clash in conflict constantly increasing, he turned his attention to strengthening the bonds of peace of the Western Hemisphere. Immediately after the 1936 election he journeyed to Buenos Aires to emphasize by his presence the importance of the Pan American Peace Conference which he had sponsored. His efforts to establish and maintain a true "good neighbor" policy with the Latin American Republics constitute a major accomplishment in his career. The truth of this statement, in a material as well as a spiritual sense, is being demonstrated with the opening of new Latin-American markets as our European markets are lost to us and in the cooperation for the preservation of western democracy among all the republics of the western world.

While the President has always, as was his duty, shown an intense interest in our foreign policy, during these first months of his administration he found pressing matters confronting us at home. And, to use his own expression, he turned his attention to "first things first." In Oswald Garrison Villard's appraisal of September 6, 1933, he complains that Roosevelt's record in the matter of foreign relations was "bad, almost disastrous." But as international crisis after crisis has arisen, the President and those who have advised with him have proved themselves abundantly able to cope with them. Evidence of the satisfaction of the American people with the administration's foreign policy was shown in the Gallup poll of October 26, 1939, and has been more emphatically demonstrated since that date.

Interviews with a cross section of voters in every State in the Union found 64.9 percent of the people approving of President Roosevelt and his policies, which was a rise of 8 points in the period since the outbreak of the war in Europe. This brought the President's popularity and the popularity of his policies to a peak even higher than that which existed when he was reelected President in 1936, with 62.5 percent of the major party vote. In his accompanying analysis, Dr. George Gallup states:

The President's largest gains in popularity have come in those groups of voters who were least favorable to him before the war broke out in Europe. Thus the survey finds an 11-point increase in his popularity since August among the upper income group, and a nearly comparable rise among voters of 50 years of age and over, who were previously Republican in their leanings. The chief reason for this increase appears to be the popularity of the President's foreign policy. Institute polls on various phases of the President's program, including revision of the Neutrality Act, shows majorities in favor of his course and indicate substantial agreement over foreign policy among Democrats and Republicans.

During the latter part of 1939, and before the beginning of the European war, the President had recommended a change in our neutrality laws. For reasons which I need not here discuss, Congress failed to take any action until the war had swooped down upon the nations of Europe and the President had called Congress into extraordinary session to carry out his original recommendations. At this extraordinary session, Congress repealed the Embargo Act and wrote a new chapter in the history of American neutrality, which was designed in a spirit of justice to the belligerents, but primarily to avoid the incidents and causes which might drag us into another European war. Notwithstanding the bitterness and acrimony with which this legislation was enacted, the American people have almost universally come to the conviction that it was a wise policy, and it has their unquestioned approval. While, under this law, we endure the greatest sacrifices ever before made by a great nation to avoid war, we are satisfied the American people are prepared to accept these sacrifices and to preserve the peace of this Republic.

Before leaving the subject of our foreign policy, to advance to the final phase of the 7-year Roosevelt record, I desire to return to a very practical phase of our foreign policy, which is involved in our reciprocal-trade agreements. The Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934, and its effect upon our commerce was discussed by Roger W. Babson, economist, in an article which appeared on February 12, 1940. The headline under which this article appeared read as follows:

Babson declares trade pacts the bright spot of the New Deal; threatened G. O. P. attack on agreements called poor strategy; cites 60-percent increase in United States exports to favored nations.

In the body of the article Mr. Babson goes on to state—

When the New Deal first stumped for this policy, world trade had dried up to a mere trickle. Commerce among nations had shrunk to 35 percent of the 1929 level. * * * Most able economists agreed that the choking off of foreign commerce was a prime cause of joblessness, hunger, and suffering in all nations. The importance of world trade has never been fully realized by most people. Foreign commerce is the keystone of world prosperity and peace. Our overseas markets in good times absorbed only 10 percent of our total output; but that 10 percent was a vital 10 percent. Half of our cotton crop, for instance, was sold abroad. * * * Over 20 reciprocal-trade agreements have been negotiated since 1934. Secretary Hull and his experts have done a painstakingly conscientious job. * * * For every concession they have made to foreign nations they have wrung from them an equally good one for Uncle Sam. Moreover, due to the so-called most-favored-nation rule, these pacts have lowered tariffs, helped business, given jobs all over the world. The reciprocal-trade program has been a truly bright spot of the New Deal * * * has increased our exports to countries with whom we have completed agreements by 60 percent, while our exports to those countries with which we have not bargained have expanded less than 40 percent. Moreover, our imports from treaty nations have not increased any faster than with nontreaty nations. This, in a nutshell, tells the effectivenss of the program, its aid to jobs and business. * * * The Republican heavy artillery is laying down the battle's opening barrage. What the outcome will be, no one knows. * * * As a statistician, I believe that the * * * trade pacts shou'd be backed to the limit by every straight-thinking, unselfish, and honest American.

In addition to these matters which I have been able to mention only in outline for lack of time and space, the progress of aviation as a part of our transportation and economic system was greatly advanced by the creation of the Civil Aeronautics Authority in 1938; and the development and progress of our long-neglected merchant marine was materially improved and strengthened by the creation of the United States Maritime Commission in 1936.

I desire here to mention one more milestone in the Roosevelt record—a milestone and accomplishment which had been recommended by previous Presidents for a period of more than 40 years.

During his years in office, with the necessary tasks involved with governmental machinery, the President had become increasingly convinced that certain departmental reorganizations were highly desirable. He recommended these reorganizations to the Congress. Hence, under the Reorganization Act of 1939, he received authority to investigate all agencies of the Government and to determine such changes as would be calculated to reduce expenditures, increase efficiency, and eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort in various departments, bureaus, and agencies of the Government.

Plans No. I and II, submitted by the President to Congress in the spring of 1939 and put into operation shortly thereafter, provided for the consolidation, under three new agencies, of the major Federal agencies dealing with public works, public assistance, and public loans. Further provisions placed the independent agricultural agencies under the Secretary of Agriculture. From an administrative standpoint a total of 27 independent agencies were consolidated under 10 agency heads. All 51 agencies, or divisions of agencies, were affected by these plans. Even in the short time which has elapsed since these changes were made it is evident on all sides that they represent practical and sensible changes too long delayed in the framework of our Federal bureaus and departments.

Here I desire to quote some comparative statistics to show the gains which have been made in these 7 years of Roosevelt's administrations in the economic, industrial, and financial set-up of the United States:

In discussing the Roosevelt record, involving the multiplicity of activities in which it has engaged for the welfare of the American people, it is inevitable that the question should have been raised concerning the cost of this program to the American people. Some of our people have been heard to say, "From an idealistic and objective standpoint, these things are all very well, but what about the bill which must ultimately be paid as a result of their accomplishment?" This is a legitimate question, and I shall undertake to answer it in a constructive manner.

It is quite true that Federal expenditures rose from approximately $4,000,000,000 in 1933 to approximately $9,000,000,000 in 1939. Recovery and relief expenditures account for 65 percent of this increase. The extraordinary expenditures of the Federal Government, which are directly attributable to the emergency, have raised the gross Federal debt by about $21,000,000,000 during the past 7 years. In order to disburse this sum efficiently, it was necessary to create additional spending and lending agencies. The money used to set up these agencies appears on the books of the Treasury as a direct expenditure. Actually, such disbursements in many instances are repayable to the Treasury, and are not legitimate accounts of the net increase of the Treasury's indebtedness, which, in an appraisal of its financial conditions, not only considers property values but considers all that may be due to it by those to whom it has loaned or advanced money, as well as that which it owes to those who have accommodated it.

It should be remembered that the Federal Treasury possesses reserve funds which constitute real assets. These assets, which are a legitimate offset to the total of American indebtedness from the Treasury standpoint, amounted to $7,715,000,000 as of December 31, 1939. On that date there was a cash balance in the general fund of the Treasury of $2,476,000,000; $2,000,000,000 in the exchange-stabilization fund which represents the value of the gold accruing to the United States from the devaluation of the dollar, representing the proprietary interest of the Government in the corporations and credit agencies it has created. If we subtract these assets from the liabilities or gross debt of the Federal Government, which amounted to $41,942,000,000 on December 31, 1939, we have a net debt of $34,227,000,000.

It should be remembered further that one large item included in this debt was an expenditure not approved by the President, but authorized by the Congress of its own volition, for which most of us voted. While I neither apologize for nor regret this vote, it is fair to the President to say that as the result of this vote an amount is included in the net debt of the Treasury which should not be charged to him or to anything that he has done. This was the payment of the soldiers' bonus. It has been estimated that this payment, or, as it is called by some, this prepayment of the soldiers' bonus, has added thus far slightly more than $2,000,000,000 to the net debt of the Federal Government since 1936. If this amount is subtracted from the net Federal debt, it leaves a balance of only $11,290,000,000 as the amount added to the national debt by this administration.

But it may be pointed out by some of our critics that these figures do not include the contingent liabilities of the Federal Government; that is to say, the amounts borrowed by the Federal lending agencies from sources other than the United States Treasury, some of which have been guaranteed by acts of Congress and which constitute contingent liabilities against the Treasury both as to principal and interest in the event of losses incurred by these agencies. Such contingent liabilities amount to approximately $5,702,000,000. The major agencies which have been permitted by law to increase the funds at their disposal for lending purposes by borrowing from the public are the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. While these amounts constitute a contingent liability against the Treasury, not a dime of the money will ever be paid out by the Treasury unless a loss is incurred by the agencies which have made these loans under the authority of Congress.

Since March 4, 1933, these agencies had made loans totaling $11,521,000,000. The total amount of such loans outstanding on the same date was $4,467,000,000. This represents only 39 percent of the original outlay, the remainder having been already repaid by the respective borrowers. The loans and amounts outstanding of these respective agencies are as follows:

Agency	Loans	Amount outstanding
Reconstruction Finance Corporation	$7,063,000,000	$1,756,000,000
Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation	994,000,000	673,000,000
Home Owners' Loan Corporation	3,464,000,000	2,038,000,000
Total	11,521,000,000	4,467,000,000

In my judgment, all fair-minded men will admit that this is truly a remarkable record, particularly in view of the fact that these were distress loans, the majority of them made on long terms at low rates of interest, which need not have been repaid so promptly. These loans have been made in practically every county in the Nation. These loans were made necessary because the ordinary lending agencies, such as commercial banks, were not in a position to supply the capital needed for these activities. The need for these loans during the past 7 years is reflected in the total amount disbursed, and the soundness of the loans is likewise reflected in the high percentage of repayments which have been made in so short a time.

The loans of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation run for a period of 10 to 20 years, those of the Home Owners'

Loan Corporation for from 15 to 25 years, and those of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for shorter periods of time, as the principal borrowers were organizations whose capital was only temporarily impaired. The effect of these loans on the national economy has been reflected in the increased national income, the increased stability of the banks, the decreased number of business failures, and the improved well-being and financial security of the individual property owner.

The satisfactory record of repayment to date leaves no justifiable reason for fear that the Treasury will ever be required to call upon Congress for additional funds with which to pay the final creditors. And on the credit side of the ledger it should not be overlooked that the method used to obtain money for these agencies has constituted a double benefit. It has both relieved the business and mortgage credit stringency and permitted individuals having money to invest to invest that money in Government-guaranteed bonds.

In this connection I desire to mention an item which is frequently overlooked, to wit, the interest rate paid on Federal bonds at this time compared with the interest rate paid before the advent of the Roosevelt administration. Although it is true that the gross national debt has shown a yearly increase since 1933—and, I might add, since 1930—the interest rate on which this debt has been carried has been substantially reduced. On March 31, 1933, the computed rate of interest upon the public debt was 3.426 percent. On December 31, 1939, the computed rate was 2.60 percent. The estimated savings in carrying charges experienced by the Government during this 6½-year period by virtue of this interest reduction amounted to $1,654,527,000. The amount thus saved paid for 28.5 percent of all interest payments made during this period. In other words, without this interest-rate reduction the gross public debt today would be $43,596,000,000 instead of $41,942,000,000.

This plan of interest-rate reduction was an integral part of the Roosevelt monetary program.

Now, let us consider for a moment that $11,290,000,000 net increase in the debt that is charged to extraordinary expenditures made by this administration. Since the bulk of it was appropriated in the form of emergency relief measures, there is a tendency on the part of the thoughtless or the willfully prejudiced to look upon it as money thrown down a sinkhole. Let us take a look at the record for a moment and ascertain what this money was expended for.

With the exception of the Federal emergency relief program, which distributed direct relief through the Governors of the States, and the distribution of surplus commodities through the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, the entire Federal relief program has been a work-relief program. These work programs, whether sponsored entirely with relief appropriations or with a combination of regular and relief appropriations, have had a common goal: To relieve unemployment distress and to energize the wheels of industry through the purchase of supplies and materials to be used on the work projects.

During the past 5 years Federal expenditures for work relief supplied by the yearly emergency relief appropriation acts have exceeded $11,000,000,000. The sum about equals the net increase in the public debt during the entire 7-year period. The Work Projects Administration, which accounted for seven of the eleven billion dollar relief bill, has estimated that 34 percent of its money has gone into durable projects, such as public buildings, dams, highways, sewers, and waterworks. This sizable percentage is all the more remarkable when it is remembered that the Work Projects Administration alone, of all the work agencies, has been concerned primarily with providing employment for those able to work but unable to find places in private industry. Other agencies operating programs designed to stimulate industry have shown higher percentages of physical returns in comparison with total expenditures.

However, the fact remains that, whether created to relieve unemployment or to aid industry, which was another way of fostering employment, these agencies have made vast contributions to the durable wealth of the Nation.

It is quite true that in 7 years Federal expenditures on various types of public works have exceeded $18,000,000,000. A break-down shows the expenditures in the following classifications:

Highways and streets	$4,173,000,000
Sewers, waterworks, and other public utilities	1,328,000,000
Educational buildings	921,000,000
Public buildings	951,000,000
Engineering structures	269,000,000
Conservation, flood control, reclamation, rivers and harbors, T. V. A.	4,308,000,000
Aviation facilities	145,000,000
Parks, playgrounds, gymnasiums, and other recreational facilities	972,000,000
Public housing	364,000,000
Rural electrification	124,000,000
National defense	4,688,000,000
Total	18,233,000,000

These figures do not include $550,000,000 appropriated by the States to match Federal road funds and almost $2,000,000,000 supplied by State and local bodies as their portion of the Public Works Administration program. Also excluded is an additional $500,000,000 which is under loan contract with the United States Housing Authority, and $3,050,000,000 worth of construction generated by the Federal Housing Authority.

Well, $11,000,000,000 on work-relief projects and a total of $18,000,000,000 on public works generally represents a lot of money. What did we get for our money?

Here are just a few of the things we got: 80,000 miles of new highways, 265,000 miles of city streets and country roads repaired; 9,600 new educational buildings; 770 new hospitals; 1,600 new courthouses; 1,500 new sewer systems; 2,400 new water systems; 282 new city electric systems; 3,400 new playgrounds and athletic fields; 380 new large bridges; 29,000 new small bridges; 4 T. V. A. dams; 220,000 miles of new rural electric lines; 1,200 new post offices, customhouses, and quarantine stations; 27,700 new low-rent dwelling units completed, and 58,000 units under construction; and the planting of 1,750,000,000 trees.

The expenditure of $18,000,000,000 for such projects is estimated to account for one-third of all Federal expenditures during the past 7 years. In no other 7-year period in the history of our Nation has so high a percentage of Federal expenditures been utilized to construct such lasting National improvements.

It may well be that when the Roosevelt record is finally appraised it will be remembered best for the lasting benefits which were the fruits of its work-relief program, which seemed so costly to contemporaries. And in any appraisal, now or later, we should not lose sight of the fact that these improvements, so important in themselves, have served to increase materially property values throughout the country.

In bringing to a conclusion this résumé of the 7-year record of Franklin D. Roosevelt, I think it only fitting, in view of the dire predictions made in 1936 concerning what would happen to the country if "that man" were allowed to continue in office, to take stock of the state of the Nation at the end of 3 years of his second term.

Raymond Clapper, in a syndicated article appearing in the Scripps-Howard newspapers on December 20, 1939, said:

> Western Republicans who have been out on pasture held a conference in Salt Lake City the other day and press reports of that meeting quote the keynoter, Representative FRANK O. HORTON, of Wyoming, as calling the New Deal "a snake that has risen to strike down American initiative."
> That has been said many times before, in less repulsive language, and it has been said so persistently and by such expert sayers that it is almost American folklore. Even men who are once more rolling in dividends are known to turn wearily from a hard day at endorsing dividend checks to curse this administration as the love-child of communism, sworn to end the American profits system.
> Unfortunately, the figures spoil the picture. My bank sends out a weekly digest of business conditions prepared by the Wall Street Journal. It is something the Republican National Committee ought to suppress. These business statistics are messing up the horrendous metaphors of Republican keynoters like Representative HORTON.
> From these figures, it looks as if considerable initiative is at work in the good old American way. Automobile output is 14 percent above the same week in 1938. Some salesmen must be out looking for prospects and finding them. Barron's business index is 90 percent now, against 78 a year ago. Somebody must have gone after orders to push up the figures that much. Electric power output and freight-car loadings each rose 11 percent above the figures of a year ago. Somewhere behind these figures businessmen are getting orders. Cotton consumption, department-store sales, variety-store sales, rubber consumption, postal receipts, life-insurance investments, are all up. The British have placed a $20,000,000 order for bombers with one American manufacturer, but leave that out. Steel production is more than 90 percent of capacity, as against 58 percent a year ago. Part of that is war business, but not all of it. The war does not account for the general rise all along the line.

Federal Reserve Board figures show that in November the industrial production index was 124, with the 1923–25 average as 100. Durable-goods manufactures were up to 130.

Discount the effect of the war, and still, somewhere in these figures must be represented an enormous amount of sales activity, scrambling for orders, fighting for business. Du Pont has just put its new silk substitute, Nylon, on the market, one of the most enormous examples of initiative in the present period.

If this administration has been trying to strike down American initiative, it has failed dismally. For after 7 years in office, it is confronted with more private initiative by far than existed when Herbert Hoover handed over the Government to the Roosevelt crew, which was almost none at all. If this administration had intended to finish off private initiative, that was the time to have done the job, for it was down on its knees and was taking the count. In fact, even some of our Republicans wondered if it could be saved and called for a dictator.

The New York Herald Tribune of January 2, 1940, carried a statement by Myron F. Converse, vice president of the National Association of Mutual Savings Banks, under the headline, "savings point to more sound business in United States; 15,000,000 bank clients with growing balances seen recovery factor."

And here are only a few of the many encouraging items to be found on the financial pages of your newspapers any day. These were taken from the Washington Post of February 15 and 16:

JANUARY BANNER MONTH FOR COTTON

Government reports disclosed yesterday that January was one of the best marketing months for American cotton in recent years. A total of 1,756,771 bales moved into export markets and into domestic consumption channels. * * * Exports amounted to 1,026,628 bales or the largest monthly total since November 1935, while domestic consumption totaled 730,143 bales, or the largest monthly total since March 1937, when 776,942 were consumed.

Dun & Bradstreet report a rise of 10.4 percent in January building permit valuations over December. This report was based on figures from 215 cities and, the agency pointed out, the improvement from December to January was against the seasonal trend.

The railroads of the Nation, faced with such a grave situation a few years ago, appear to be having their share of prosperity. Preliminary reports from 87 class I railroads showed a net in January of 12.4 percent over the same month of 1939, according to the Association of American Railroads. The New York Central reported a 1939 net of $4,509,236, as against a deficit of $20,154,357 in 1938, with the final month of 1939 being overwhelmingly the best. Paul G. Hoffman, president of the Studebaker Corporation, announced that their January sales were "the largest for that month since 1925 and were 80 percent larger than 1939." This covered the factory sales of both passenger cars and trucks. Domestic retail deliveries showed a gain of 91 percent over January 1939.

Heading a list of reports of the 1939 earnings of eight large corporations, each of which showed a substantial increase in net profits over the preceding year, we find General Foods Corporation with a net income for 1939 of $15,118,063—the greatest in 8 years. The profit, equal to $2.75 a common share, compares with $13,577,075, or $2.50 a share in 1938, according to the Associated Press dispatch.

Colby M. Chester, president of the board, is quoted as announcing:

Sales in every quarter during 1939 exceeded the volume of any similar quarter of previous years. Total case sales volume for the year was the largest in the history of the company.

If this be "Roosevelt ruin," let the President's critics make the most of it!

In further cumulative evidence of the decided improvement in our national economic situation, I might mention the fact that exports of American products to the markets of the world in January 1940 amounted to $368,550,000, compared with $212,911,000 in January 1939, an increase of 75 percent. Imports during the same months in 1940 were $241,961,000, compared to $178,246,000 in January 1939. Exports over imports in January 1940 amounted to $120,000,000. The net profits of Commonwealth & Southern Co. in 1938 were $10,586,000, while for 1939 they were $13,499,000.

The net profits of the Ohio Bell Telephone Co. in 1938 were $9,968,000, while for 1939 they were $10,764,000.

Mr. President, in 1938 the net profits of Brooklyn-Edison Co. were $10,442,000, while for 1939 they were $11,669,000.

In 1938 the net profits of the Eton Manufacturing Co. were $2,568,000, while in 1939 they were $2,707,000, the largest in the history of the company.

In 1938 the profits of the Anchor, Hocking Glass Corporation were $752,000, while for 1939 they were $1,445,000.

In 1938 the profits of the Ex-Cell-O Corporation were $437,000, while in 1939 they were $872,000.

In 1938 the profits of the Florence Stove Co. were $876,000, while for 1939 they were $1,233,000.

In 1938 the net profits of the "Fruit of the Loom," Inc., were $25,000, and in 1939 they were $142,000.

In 1938 the profits of the Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky were $2,604,000, while in 1939 they were $3,979,000.

In 1938 the net profits of the Veedor-Root, Inc., were $553,000, while in 1939 they were $900,000.

In the January quarter of 1938 the net profits of the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co. were $389,000, while in the same quarter of 1939 they were $754,000.

In the January quarter of 1938 the profits of Servel Co. were $278,000, while in the same quarter of 1939 they were $354,000.

In 1938 the profits of Penick & Ford were $1,139,000, while in 1939 they were $1,456,000.

The total operating revenue of the Seaboard Railroad in January 1939 was $530,000, while in January 1940 it was $4,575,000.

In 1938 the net profits of the Mohawk Carpet Co. were $1,580,000, while in 1939 they were $1,798,000, constituting the best year since 1930.

In 1938 the net profits of the Industrial Rayon Corporation were $184,000, as compared to $262,000 in 1937, while their profits for 1939 increased to $1,348,000.

On February 6, 1940, the General Motors Corporation ordered a distribution of $34,501,000 to its stockholders.

Retail sales throughout the country for the first quarter of 1940 are estimated at 9 percent above the same period in 1939.

In January 1940 individual incomes in the United States amounted to $6,051,000,000, which, although below the December individual income, was $651,000,000 more than in January 1939.

The January 1940 farm incomes in the United States amounted to $733,000,000, which is $99,000,000 above farm incomes for January 1939.

In 1939 the net profits of all banks in the second Federal Reserve district were 16.1 percent of the total bank earnings in 1939, compared with 9.9 percent of the total earnings in 1938.

In 1932–34 residential construction in the United States amounted to practically nothing, but since 1934, and including 1939, it has increased to about $500,000,000 per annum, and it is estimated, according to the same rate of increase, that for 1940 the figure will approach $600,000,000.

These are but a few of the encouraging signs of Nation-wide improvements in our industrial, financial, and economic structure as compared to previous years, and especially as compared with 1932 and 1933.

In 1932 the average price of American bonds of industrial corporations was 69.5 percent of normal, while in 1939 the average price was 81.6 percent of normal.

In 1932 the average price of common stock of American corporations was 48.6 percent of normal, while in 1937 the average price of the same stock was 111.8 percent, and in 1938, 89.2 percent.

These figures are only a small portion of the accumulating evidence of returning prosperity to the people of the United States and belie all the moanings and wailings and gnashings of teeth that are being indulged in now by those who are seeking some political advantage through the creation of disdain among the American people.

While the Department of Commerce has stated that the net income of all the American people for 1939 was $68,500,000,000, the Alexander Hamilton Institute, on February 19, 1940, announced that our national income was $71,704,000,000, compared with $63,993,000,000 for 1938, and that, with the exception of 1937, when the national income was $71,853,000,000, the 1939 figures were the largest since the year 1929; and this same Alexander Hamilton Institute predicted that our national income for 1940 would be larger than that in 1939.

In spite of these advances all along the line of industrial and economic development, our critics complain that we have not completely solved the unemployment problem and that there are still from seven to nine million unemployed workers in the United States.

It is a regrettable fact that in spite of all the efforts we have made there are still too many millions of our people on the unemployed rolls. But I have searched in vain among any of our critics, including Presidential candidates, whose common theme song is now the alleged failure of the New Deal, to offer any constructive suggestions that contribute to a solution of the unemployment problem.

I think it is fair to say that without regard to party affiliations, nobody as yet has the last word in the solution of this tragic and compelling situation. Seven years ago there were between thirteen and fifteen million unemployed workers in the United States. Today, it is said there are between seven and nine millions. In my opinion, there is no accurate information existing as to the precise number of those who are able and willing to work who are yet unemployed. But, in considering this problem, it must be remembered that prior to 1933 there were undoubtedly hidden lists of names of those millions of men and women who were unemployed but whose existence was unknown from a national standpoint and who were not taken into account even in the earlier estimates, because their existence had not been recognized as a national problem, because their needs were administered to by local governments and charitable organizations.

In comparing the number of employed in the Nation today with the number in 1933, it must be remembered that in 1939 our total production of commodities equalled that of 1929. In other words, after 10 years of depression, the output of the American people in 1939 was as great as that of 1929, but it required 1,500,000 fewer men to produce this output in 1939 than were required in 1929; showing that during that decade the development of machinery had so advanced as to increase the output per man to such an extent as to require one and one-half million men less to produce the same amount of goods than were required at the beginning of the decade.

In addition to this, there were 5,000,000 more workers available in 1939 than there were in 1929. This is a net increase in the number of workers available, after deducting all those who had died or had ceased to be qualified for work in the same line of work as that previously engaged in. The reduction of one and one-half million men in the number of men required to do the same work and the addition of 5,000,000 qualified workers who had come on the scene since 1929 accounts for approximately 6,500,000 of the 9,000,000 who are said yet to be unemployed throughout the United States.

In other words, considering the 13,000,000 who were unemployed in 1933 and the 5,000,000 by which the number of available employees has increased since then, the practical result is that we have been compelled to deal with a margin of more than 18,000,000 men who were potentially unemployed throughout the past 7 years. And it cannot be denied that even taking these stupendous figures, we have reduced the total unemployed by 50 percent, while as now compared, the 9,000,000 men said to be unemployed, with the more than 13,000,000 unemployed in 1933, we have reduced the total by nearly three-fourths.

If it be true, that there are still 9,000,000 unemployed, then we are entitled to subtract from that number the six and one-half millions accounted for by the improvements in machinery and the natural increase in the number of available workers so that the net result is that only about two and one-half millions of unemployed workers are left as a net deficiency or failure in securing jobs for the people.

It may be said that if the population has increased enough to add 5,000,000 workers to the total list the consumptive power of the people should have increased so as to absorb this number of increased workers. But it must be remembered that we have had only 7 years to climb the hill from the depths of the depression as it existed in 1933. If it took 12 years of political and economic folly to throw 13,000,000 men out of work, we claim to have attained a miraculous success if we have been able to put three-fourths of them back to work in 7 years in addition to the absorption of those who have newly come upon the scene and those who have been displaced by mechanical improvements.

Neither I nor any other fair-minded man claim that we have completely solved the problem of unemployment, but if our industrial and social and economic system could improve over the next 4 years at the same rate at which it has improved during the last 7 years, unemployment would be almost completely eliminated in the United States.

But there are other equations that enter into the gains that we have made in these last 7 years. In making this appraisal we must distinguish between two kinds of results. Into one category fall those concrete, material things which enter into our daily lives and are readily recognizable by the senses, such as those which I have been discussing, and into the other category fall those things of mind and spirit which penetrate our consciousness gradually, without our being aware of it, until it has become a part of our attitude and viewpoint with reference to the problems of human society.

Among the splendid accomplishments of the Roosevelt administration those which have been counted in the latter field are in my belief of even greater importance and more lasting in their effects than all the varied financial or economic improvements of a material nature that have been made in the condition of our country.

The evolution which has been wrought by the New Deal in our social and economic thinking has been a development which is bound to reflect itself in immeasurable good in all our domestic affairs, as well as our international relations, as long as our Government shall exist.

For nearly a century before 1933 the citizens of the Nation, partly by precept and partly by their own smugness, had come to regard the Government of the United States as something aloof and apart from their daily lives, a sort of abstract, remote agency which could have no concern over their personal affairs beyond the collection of taxes and the drawing of salaries by those who held public office. The people had become so accustomed to being told that they were rugged individuals, that it was a matter of the survival of the fittest, that when they lost their savings in bank failures, or were swindled by the peddlers of worthless stocks, or were oppressed by usurious rates of interest, or were thrown out of their jobs arbitrarily to suffer hunger and privation, that they accepted with resignation their condition as the common fate of mankind.

Whatever may be charged against it in point of failure, whatever may be said of it as representing too much governmental activity in behalf of the people, the Roosevelt administration has now convinced the American people that their grievances and the injustices which they have suffered and may suffer are matters over which the Government has a right to be concerned. The Roosevelt administration accepted the general-welfare clause of the Constitution as a solemn obligation, and it proceeded by swift and enlightened legislation to correct, as far as possible, the ills which bedevelled our people. Not all of them, to be true, for it would be a miraculous performance for the Government to uproot all these evils and injustices in the short period of 7 years. But so indelibly stamped upon the minds and hearts of the people is the picture of these Herculean efforts put forth by the Government to aid them in the solution of their problems that no administration hereafter will be able to find an alibi in the doctrine of laissez faire.

I have perused the fulminations of those of an opposing political faith who would fain succeed Franklin Roosevelt as President of the United States. It is natural for them to seek to arouse their own partisans by condemning the record of the Roosevelt administration. I have read that part of the report of the committee of 200, headed by Dr. Glenn Frank, who have spent 2 years with every form of magnifying instruments to find knotholes in the Democratic fence. While some of these documents put forth by candidates and committees contain constructive suggestions, none of them recommend the repeal or substantial modification of a single major legislative act which has been passed under the Roosevelt administration. The most that they claim is that they need improvement, and that those who have had nothing to do with their fabrication are better qualified to improve them than are their sponsors. I take this as a genuine compliment to the administration of President Roosevelt, and it is also, in a sense, a compliment to the political judgment of those who want to come into office because they are out.

These are the facts of accomplishments. They are not idealizations or promises. And I reiterate that never in the history of civilization, from the Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, or the Declaration of Independence of the United States and the signing of the Constitution, with its subsequent amendments, has there been a period in any existing government that has contributed more by legislative enactment and administrative activity than the Democratic administration of the past 7 years. Never has there been a time when laws were made of greater benefit to the people at large, laws for the encouragement of youth, laws to permit the freer possession of land, ownership of homes, the protection of health, the preservation of the life of the aged and helpless and the underprivileged. I say that the past 7 years will go down in history as a great humanitarian contribution, when a great leader, endowed with the passionate and patriotic resolve to salvage a nation, pulled us out of despair and set us on the road to national rehabilitation, renewing our faith in the American way of life and our own spiritual resources.

This imperfect résumé of these outstanding 7 years may not satisfy the intellectual processes of those who see no good in any era that expands the participation of the people in the benefits of the government which they support. It may not satisfy the vision of those whose eyes can see nothing from any angle except the rear, but these 7 years in the minds and hearts of the American people are in the annals of our recorded history and take their place in that history as not only tragic and crucial years, but years which have marked an immeasurable advance in the relationship between a great people and a great government. These advances and accomplishments have not been made in derogation of our form of government or the ideals concerning it which are embedded in the hearts of our people, but these advances have been made and these accomplishments have been recorded in order that we might the better preserve our Government by preserving the respect and affection in which the people hold it.

Mr. President, I do not expect every Member of the Senate, nor everyone in the country to agree with my analysis of the last 7 years. It would not be prudent for our opponents, who are now on the verge of a contest to wrest from the Democratic Party the administration of the affairs of this country, to make any admissions that might handicap them in the approaching campaign. But I think it is fair to say, without regard to party affiliations, that no period of 7 years in American history has seen any man or any group of men try more earnestly or faithfully to understand the problems that beset the American people and try more faithfully and earnestly to solve those problems.

Not only have we done these things which have added to the material value of our economic life in every community, in the building of highways, streets and sidewalks, courthouses and schoolhouses and hospitals, of waterworks and sewer systems, and various other forms of expenditure that have given to every American citizen, without regard to politics, a pride in his Government; but we have demonstrated, Mr. President, as has never been demonstrated before, that the Government of the United States is not a far-off institution sitting on the crest of some Olympian mountain, where dwell the gods of political power, taking no heed of the ordinary affairs of mortal men. We have demonstrated that ours is the Government that was described by Lincoln: "Of the people, by the people, and for the people." We have demonstrated that it is not a Government organized and sustained merely for the purpose of levying taxes and holding office. We have demonstrated that it is a Government with a heart; that it can sit down by the fireside of the humblest man and woman in America and make its experience and its power and its intelligence available to these humble homes in the effort to solve their economic and social and political problems.

As a fair and honorable man, I do not claim that our political organization, our political administration, possesses all the virtue in the political, economic, moral, or intellectual life of this Nation. I recognize that there exists in our opponents here in the Senate and in millions of them scattered throughout the Nation, as earnest and as faithful a desire to aid the American people as we have a right to claim for ourselves. I have always maintained, and I now maintain, that beneath the political labels, beneath the superficial partisan feeling that we sometimes manifest in our discussion of the best way in which we may accomplish the common good to our country, we are all fundamentally and soundly American.

And I would lose faith in America and in American democracy if I did not believe that fundamentally we are all Americans first before we are partisans.

But I am equally convinced that when the impartial historian shall write the history of these 7 years he will say that never since the days of Lincoln has any man faced such tremendous problems, which might have bid fair to uproot and destroy the very foundations of our faith in democracy, and never has any man since Lincoln undertaken more unselfishly and more wisely to meet those problems and to master them.

Not only have we undertaken to increase the income of all branches of our people, to increase employment, and to increase the output of industry, but we have undertaken to add a moral and spiritual tone to our political institutions, without which no government anywhere in the world can long endure.

We look around in the world today, and we see everywhere chaos and contest; we see that the flags of battle have been unfurled; we see ruthless autocracy taking charge of the rights and liberties of the people; we see men, women, and children, regardless of their merits and their ancestry, and frequently because of their ancestry, and because of their religious beliefs, being murdered or driven from their homes, and all the things which they have held dear from generation to generation destroyed in their very faces.

We have seen the theory of democracy under attack on a broader field than at any time in the last 100 years. And yet here in America, and in the Western Hemisphere, we have drawn closer together, we have preserved the theory and the practices of democracy, we have preserved the peace of our Nation, though we have made some sacrifices in order to do it. We have preserved and protected the peace and the dignity of the western world. And when, after a while, all the nations shall awake to the fact that war brings no victory, no laurels to any man, any nation, or to any tribe, I pray Almighty God that our Nation, without regard to partisanship, race, or religion, may offer its services to a benighted and distressed mankind to bring again peace to the world and the universal enthronement of democracy.

We have not only tried to improve our material well being, but we have tried to do those things which appeal to the heart and the spirit of mankind. When the bitterness, narrowness, and prejudice of this era have passed away, and the impartial, cool-headed historian shall write the story of this period, he will accord Franklin D. Roosevelt one of the highest places in the history of American statesmanship.

Mrs. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the majority leader, has well outlined the achievements of the Democratic administration, but I wish to add the review as made by The Democratic Digest under the title of "Promise and Performance."

I ask that there may be incorporated in the RECORD an article from The Democratic Digest, published by the Women's Division of the Democratic National Committee, showing the actual performance of the administration of President Roosevelt as compared with the promises made in the platforms of 1932 and 1936.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

PROMISE AND PERFORMANCE

Now opens another election year—1940. It is the year when Democrats must conserve and consolidate the great reforms of the past 8 years. Today, tomorrow, and in all the weeks and months until the November election, the energy and enthusiasm generated by the New Deal must be turned to the all-important work of assuring for the Democratic Party another 4 years of national administration in order that these social and economic gains may be permanent.

The Democratic Party proudly stands on the performance of the history-changing platform pledges it made in 1932, and to the continuing and more specific promises of 1936. These commitments have been abundantly fulfilled.

Two excerpts from the 1932 platform summarize the New Deal story: "The only hope for improving present conditions * * * lies in a drastic change in economic governmental policies" to assure "equal rights to all, special privileges to none," and "We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept." The 1936 platform carried forward those principles and declared for (1) protection of family and home, (2) establishment of democracy of opportunity, and (3) aid to those overtaken by disaster.

Facts citing how these principles have been carried out and how the Democratic Party has fulfilled its pledges to the people are set forth in the following platform check-ups:

PLATFORM CHECK-UP NO. 1

Protection of family and home

The party pledged itself, first, to the protection of the family and the home. Faithfully this promise has been carried out through such measures as the Social Security Act, the housing program, measures which safeguard family investments and protection against crime and exploitation.

1. Protection Against Underworld Crime and Upperworld Exploitation

(a) "We have begun, and shall continue, the successful drive to rid our land of kidnapers and bandits."

In 1933 the States were, in many instances, without facilities or power to reach interstate criminals, who roamed at large.

The Seventy-third Congress (1934) passed 22 laws as part of the Attorney General's program to aid law-enforcement authorities in the suppression of crime. Results: In 1939 alone 9,823 fugitives from justice were located through the facilities of the F. B. I.; since enactment of the Federal kidnaping law (June 1932), the F. B. I. has investigated 156 cases, of which 154 were solved; as a result of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act, 51,991 stolen motor vehicles, valued at $30,399,054, have been recovered through F. B. I. Bank robberies, which reached their peak in 1932, have declined over 80 percent.

(b) "We shall continue to use the powers of government to end the activities of the malefactors of great wealth, to defraud and exploit the people."

The New Deal moved in on monopoly. To ascertain the true state of affairs with regard to concentration of economic power and financial control over production and distribution of goods, the Temporary National Economic Committee (antimonopoly committee) held extended public hearings and also collected and collaborated facts assembled in various Federal departments. This study will make possible the passage of laws to meet the pressing problems of a changing economy. The S. E. C. curbed holding companies. The antitrust laws, which had lain fairly quiescent for years, were dusted off and put to work. Since 1932, 84 cases against unfair business practices have been instituted by the Federal Government.

2. Savings and Investment

"We have safeguarded the thrift of our citizens by restraining those who would gamble with other people's savings."

The S. E. C. protects the public by outlawing dishonest dealing, prohibiting the sale of fraudulent securities, giving the investor full information about issues and issuers. One billion dollars' worth of proposed issues were abandoned, the sale of $150,000,000 worth of security prevented, thus saving citizens millions of dollars.

Between 1921 and 1933 bank failures averaged 900 a year, involving an annual average of more than $400,000,000 of deposits. Depositors are now insured against loss by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which has eliminated such losses. In the same way, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation insures investors in home-financing institutions. There are 2,350,000 insured investors in 2,188 member institutions.

3. Old Age and Social Security

"On the foundation of the Social Security Act, we are determined to erect a structure of economic security for all our people."

The year 1939, which brought the extension of social security through amendment and the governmental reorganization for a more concerted attack on all forms of insecurity, marked a milestone as important as the 1935 passage of the Social Security Act, most comprehensive program for social welfare ever undertaken through direct legislation. Some 45,000,000 workers have applied for old-age insurance accounts; more than twenty-seven and one-half million wage earners are covered by job-insurance laws operating in every State; about two and one-half million of the needy—the old, the blind, the dependent children—are getting cash allowances from Federal-State assistance funds. Aid has been provided for crippled and dependent children, and public-health programs have been fostered.

4. Consumer

"We will act to secure to the consumer fair value, honest sales, and a decreased spread between the price he pays and the price the producer receives."

More honest sales have been assured by the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938, which also protects the life and health of the Nation by drastic restriction on sale of adulterated, misbranded, and dangerous foods, drugs, and cosmetics. Vital protection to the milk and meat consumer is afforded by the emergency animal-disease eradication program of the Jones-Connally Act, which has wiped out bovine tuberculosis. False advertising and bad business practices were curbed by amendments to the Federal Trade Commission Act. The Consumers' Council Division, A. A. A., gives information on economic buying of farm commodities, reports on developments of the consumer cooperative movement; publishes the helpful "Consumers' Guide."

5. Rural Electrification

"We will continue to promote plans for rural electrification and for cheap power by means of the yardstick method."

Before the Rural Electrification Administration was established in May 1935 only 1 farm home in 10 had electricity. Now 1 farm home in 5 benefits by it. R. E. A. projects are bringing new conveniences and lightening the drudgery of farm work for 1,500,000 people on 300,000 farms.

Lower rates and greater use of electricity, in both private and public utilities, have been brought about by the operation of the Tennessee Valley Authority, New Deal yardstick which proved beyond doubt that this universal servant could be put to better use, and brought to all the people.

The T. V. A. average retail rate was 1.99 per kilowatt hour through 1938, when the rest of the country averaged paying 4.40 per kilowatt-hour. The T. V. A. customer consumption was 58 percent above the average for the Nation. Rates were lowered the country over. The 1934 urban price for 100 kilowatt hours was $4.65; the 1939 price $3.96.

6. Housing

"We maintain that our people are entitled to decent, adequate housing at a price which they can afford. We believe every encouragement should be given to the building of new homes by private enterprise; and that the Government should steadily extend housing programs toward the goal of adequate housing for those forced, through economic necessities, to live in unhealthy and slum conditions."

A Nation-wide program of home building and modernization has been accomplished through three New Deal agencies, the Federal Housing Administration, which is concerned with adequate housing for every pocketbook; the United States Housing Authority, providing homes instead of slums; and the Farm Security Administration, through which farm tenants become home owners.

By stimulating private enterprise in the construction industry, F. H. A. has created the equal of 1 year's work for more than 2,000,000 men. More than 2,000,000 people are living in houses built or financed under the F. H. A.'s home-ownership program. Almost 100,000 more are living in large-scale housing projects which private companies have built for rent under F. H. A. The U. S. H. A. has financed 121,000 modern, low-rent dwellings now complete or to be completed by the late spring of 1940. An equal amount of slum dwellings will be cleared; 640,000 persons will have moved from substandard living quarters to these new homes. The F. S. A. has made possible the building of more than 12,000 houses by former renters who now are purchasing farms through F. S. A. Average cost of these homes is but $1,313.

7. Veterans

"We shall continue just treatment to our war veterans and their dependents."

The greatest benefit given veterans by the Federal Government is that of hospitalization in up-to-date, scientific hospitals. Hospitalization has gone forward not only in the number of facilities and available beds, but also by the introduction of new diagnostic and treatment methods and the training of medical personnel. Since 1933, facilities have increased from 71 to 84; hospital and domiciliary beds from 60,707 to 72,090. Present plans will mean 100,000 beds within the next 10 years.

The policy of consolidating field activities, for economy and effectiveness, has been consistently followed where possible without impairing service to the veterans. Since March 1933, 21 consolidations have been effected.

Continuous study has been given to the subject of monetary benefits payable to veterans and their dependents in the form of pension or compensation. Far-reaching changes have been made in the laws and regulations governing the granting of such benefits, the principal objective being to provide the greatest relief to those veterans who were disabled as a result of active services in the armed forces in time of war, and to their dependents to eliminate inequalities.

A democracy of opportunity

Second major objective was the establishment of a democracy of opportunity through specific measures to aid agriculture, labor, and business. Also important to democracy of opportunity were measures to overcome the handicaps of youth resulting from the depression. To get at fundamental causes of economic inequalities, the Democratic Party promised to deal with monopoly and concentration of economic power.

1. Agriculture

(a) "We have taken farmers off the road to ruin. We have kept our pledge to agriculture to use all available means to raise farm income."

In 1932, the farm cash income was $4,682,000,000. In 1939, farm cash income was approximately $8,300,000,000. The actual purchasing power of the 1938 farm income was 95 percent of its 1929 level.

(b) "The farmer is no longer suffering from 15-cent corn, 3-cent hogs, 2½-cent beef at the farm, 5-cent wool, 30-cent wheat, 5-cent cotton, and 3-cent sugar."

As of late 1939, the low depression prices thus quoted in the 1936 platform had been raised to the following figures: 50.3-cent corn, 5-cent hogs, 7-cent beef, 27½-cent wool, 82.4-cent wheat, and 9.7-cent cotton. In 1939, sugar beet growers received an income of $6.52 per ton, compared with $5.26 in 1932. Cane growers received an average of $3.93 per ton in 1939, compared with $3.06 in 1932.

(c) "By Federal legislation we have reduced the farmer's indebtedness."

Farm mortgage indebtedness on January 1, 1939, was $7,070,986,000, the lowest since 1918. The number of forced sales resulting from foreclosures declined 68 percent from March 1933 to 1939, and farm bankruptcies declined 70 percent in the same period.

(d) "In cooperation with the States and through the farmers' own committees, we are restoring the fertility of the land and checking the erosion of its soil. We will continue to improve the soil conservation and domestic allotment program with payments to farmers."

The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 provides for soil-conservation payments and price-adjustment payments to farmers. It provides for commodity loans on wheat, corn, cotton, tobacco, and rice. The scope of this program is shown by the fact that in 1939 nearly 6,000,000 farmers were participating in the agricultural conservation program. Eighty percent of the total crop land was covered by applications for Government payments.

(e) "We are bringing electricity and good roads to the farm home."

Before the start of the Rural Electrification Administration, only 10 percent of American farm homes had electricity; now 25 percent have. There are R. E. A. projects in 45 of the 48 States, embracing 250,000 miles of rural lines to serve more than 600,000 farm families. The W. P. A. alone has built or improved 325,000 miles of rural roads since July 1935.

(f) "We recognize the gravity of the evils of farm tenancy and we pledge the full cooperation of the Government in the refinancing of farm indebtedness at the lowest possible rates of interest and over a long term of years."

Since October 1, 1935, the Farm Credit Administration has enabled between eighty and ninety thousand farmers to buy their own farms with assistance of mortgage loans extended by institutions under supervision of the Farm Credit Administration and other Government credit. Under the Farm Tenancy Act, 6,180 tenants have been granted long-time loans with which to purchase farms, under appropriations totaling $35,000,000. An additional appropriation of $40,000,000 has been made for this year which will enable 7,000 more tenant farmers to become owners.

(g) "We favor the production of all the market will absorb, both at home and abroad, plus a reserve supply sufficient to insure fair prices to consumers."

The ever-normal-granary program provides for acreage allotments that normally will produce all the domestic market will absorb, plus all the export market will take, plus 30 percent for a reserve supply, thus insuring consumers an abundance in years of scarcity. It provides for adjusting production to demand and encourages sound, practical, farm cooperatives.

2. Labor

(a) "We have increased the worker's pay and shortened his hours."

This was written into law by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, which set a 6-year period in which to achieve a 40-hour maximum week and a minimum wage of 40 cents an hour. Some 900,000 workers have had pay-rate increases since the law went into effect.

(b) "We have undertaken to put an end to the sweat of labor of the worker's wife and children."

The Fair Labor Standards Act banned child labor from industries operating in interstate commerce and took first steps toward elimination of industrial homework.

(c) "We have written into the law of the land his right to collective bargaining and self-organization free from the interference of employers; we have provided Federal machinery for the peaceful settlement of labor disputes."

The National Labor Relations Act protects the worker's right to organize, to bargain collectively, and other civil liberties. From October 1935 to March 1938 the Board which administers this act handled 12,485 cases involving 3,247,678 workers. Out of 9,150 cases closed, 5,081 (55 percent) were closed by agreement of both parties; 1,444 cases involved strikes, 77 percent of which the Board settled, averting 519 strikes.

(d) "We will continue to protect the worker and we will guard his rights."

Weekly factory pay rolls rose from $72,697,000 in March 1933 to $164,089,000 by June 1939, a gain of $91,392,000, and total nonagricultural private employment in the same period rose from 26,100,000 to 33,500,000, a gain of 7,400,000. Non-farm residential building which stimulates employment in many other lines amounted to $1,700,000,000 last year, an advance of $1,500,000,000 over 1933.

3. Business

(a) "We have taken the American businessman out of the red."

President Roosevelt, in his 1940 Budget message, said: "As the Budget is being prepared we are achieving the highest levels of production and consumption in our history." In the 4 years following 1933, the national income rose 69 percent, from forty-two billions to seventy-two billions, the largest absolute rise for any similar period in our history. The recession decline of 1937–38 was a temporary set-back in the upward trend. The estimated national income for 1939 was sixty-eight and one-half billion dollars.

From 1932 to 1939 industrial production had increased 64 percent; employment 22 percent; retail trade 49 percent, from $25,597,000,000 to an estimated $38,072,000,000; wholesale trade 56 percent, from $13,274,000,000 to an estimated $20,700,000,000.

(b) "We have saved the banks and given them a sounder foundation."

Through the insurance of deposits by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the revision of the national banking laws, administered by the Comptroller of the Currency, we have immeasurably increased the stability of the Nation's banking system, completely restoring the confidence of depositors. Of the 15,131 banks in the country on June 30, 1939, a total of 13,620 were insured by the F. D. I. C. In the 3 years previous to the establishment of the F. D. I. C. in 1934, 8,725 banks were suspended. In the period from 1934 to June 30, 1939, only 303 insured banks have been closed. Of the total deposits in these banks, 97.1 were made available promptly without loss to depositors. Of the 840,277 depositors, only 1,528, or less than one-quarter of 1 percent, held accounts in excess of $5,000, which were not fully protected.

(c) "We have extended credit; we have lowered interest rates."

The R. F. C. has authorized loans to date totaling more than $13,669,514,319, the Commodity Credit Corporation $1,292,312,753, and the H. O. L. C. $3,930,000,000. The F. H. A. has insured loans totaling $2,045,600,000. In all Federal-guaranteed financing, loans are on a long-term, low-interest basis.

(d) "We have undertaken to free the businessman from the ravages of cutthroat competition."

The Federal Trade Commission was given new powers by Congress in 1938 to enforce orders against practices which damage trade competitors.

4. Youth

"We have aided youth to stay in school; given them constructive occupation; opened the door to opportunity which 12 years of Republican neglect had closed."

Under the N. Y. A. student-work program, 500,000 needy students are working in approximately 26,500 schools and 1,697 colleges. The out-of-school work program of N. Y. A. employs 286,000 young people on public-work projects. N. Y. A. also conducts a guidance and placement program to assist young people in obtaining suitable jobs in private employment.

Each year the Civilian Conservation Corps is offering an opportunity for security, work training, and gainful employment to about 325,000 idle young men. An aggregate of some 2,505,000 had been given employment in C. C. C. camps from April 1933 to November 1939.

5. Monopoly

"We pledge vigorously and fearlessly to enforce the criminal and civil provisions of the existing antitrust laws."

This pledge is not only being carried out by increased activities in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice but a sweeping monopoly investigation has also been launched and is now being carried forward through the Temporary National Economic Committee. Since 1932, 84 cases against unfair business practices have been instituted by the Federal Government.

PLATFORM CHECK-UP NO. 3

Basic Democratic principles

The third outstanding Democratic pledge—aid to those overtaken by disaster—has also been fulfilled in accordance with the other fundamental Democratic principles incorporated in the 1936 Democratic platform.

1. Aid to Those Overtaken by Disaster

(a) "We have aided and will continue to aid those who have been visited by widespread drought and floods."

Under the New Deal, the Government assumed responsibility for alleviating the intense human suffering which followed in the wake of widespread floods, droughts, and dust storms. This relief included food, clothing and shelter to the sufferers, provision of relief jobs through the Work Projects Administration where such calamities had thrown hundreds out of work, and a continuing rehabilitation program through the Farm Security Administration. Disasters thus handled since 1933 include the California flood, the Ohio River Basin flood, Connecticut River Valley flood, the New England hurricane disaster, the Florida hurricane, the Georgia cyclone, and the Dust Bowl drought, for which rehabilitation has been continuous since 1933. Individual loans from the Disaster Loan Corporation totaled $17,000,000.

(b) "We have adopted a Nation-wide flood-control policy."

Under this administration, the National Resources Board has carried on a continuous basic study of flood control and drought prevention for the country as a whole. Great projects chiefly for drought prevention include Boulder Dam, Grand Coulee Dam, Fort Peck Dam, and Bonneville Dam. Projects primarily for flood control include the 10-dam system of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Marshal Ford Dam, and the great flood-control works constructed by Army engineers. W. P. A. expenditures for conservation and flood control, forestation, and land utilization have totaled more than $1,000,000,000. P. W. A. allotted $160,000,000 for non-Federal flood control, water power, and reclamation projects. The Omnibus Flood Control Act of 1936 for the first time covered the improvement of large streams with Federal and local governments sharing costs, authorizing some 270 flood-control projects with an estimated cost of about $300,000,000 in 31 States.

(c) "We believe that unemployment is a national problem and that it is the inescapable obligation of our Government to meet it in a national way. * * * We shall continue to maintain that the first objective of a program of economic security is maximum employment in private industry at adequate wages. * * *"

Here is the record of what the New Deal has done in increasing employment and earnings from March 1933 to December 1939: Total nonagricultural employment rose from 26,086,000 to 34,940,000. Income from wages and salaries rose from $2,217,000,000 to $3,883,000,000. Weekly factory pay rolls rose from $72,697,000 to $197,069,000.

(d) "Where business fails to supply such employment we believe that work at prevailing wages should be provided in cooperation with State and local governments on useful public projects."

During the past 6½ years, the Public Works Administration has allotted funds for the construction of 34,468 projects, costing $5,981,653,077, which have meant employment to skilled, semiskilled, and unskilled labor in practically every branch of American industry.

Since the beginning of the W. P. A. program in the late summer of 1935, almost 7,500,000 different persons have been employed at one time or another on W. P. A. projects alone. The work program of the National Youth Administration has given part-time employment to approximately 767,000 youths. An average of 272,000 young men who would otherwise be idle have been employed by the Civilian Conservation Corps.

The New Deal has taken two outstanding steps toward genuine job security: (1) Providing a Nation-wide employment service which placed more than 28,000,000 men and women in jobs; (2) creation of a Nation-wide unemployment insurance system through the Social Security Act, under which in 1938 and 1939 approximately 8,800,000 persons received benefit payments of approximately $825,233,000.

2. Federal-State Cooperation

"Transactions and activities which inevitably overflow State boundaries call for both State and Federal treatment. We have sought and will continue to seek to meet these problems through legislation within the Constitution."

Illustrative of this principle is the whole sweep of New Deal legislation to regulate interstate commerce, protect public health and safety, and safeguard economic security. Examples are the Social Security Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the work-relief acts.

3. The Merit System

"For the protection of government itself and for promotion of its efficiency we pledge the immediate extension of the merit system through the classified civil service to all non-policy-making positions in the Federal service."

Outstanding have been civil-service gains in the present administration. The Social Security Board was the largest agency ever placed from its beginning under civil-service rules. The Postmaster Act of June 1938 included under civil service first, second, and third-class postmasters, a total of 14,886 postmaster positions which previously had been patronage appointments. By Executive order effective February 1, 1939, the first complete revision of civil-service rules since 1903, all non-policy-determining positions not specifically exempted by law were placed under civil service, and modern personnel divisions were set up in 23 departments and agencies. The Ramspeck bill, which has passed the House, would give the President authority to include such positions now excluded by statute and also to include 350,000 positions in field service.

These merit system gains are in keeping with the statement of policy made by President Roosevelt: "Well-selected, well-trained, well-supervised personnel with opportunity to advance in the service on a basis of merit is the key to effective government administration."

4. Civil Liberties

"We shall continue to guard the freedom of speech, press, radio, religion, and assembly which our Constitution guarantees."

Years that parallel the New Deal years have seen the stifling of civil liberties in Europe, but their continuance and growth in this country, despite the fact of war in many parts of the world.

Specific instances of advance include two Supreme Court decisions, one declaring invalid city ordinances forbidding right of assembly to certain groups, the other declaring legal the distribution of circulars and handbills which had been forbidden in certain cities on the grounds that such circulars cluttered the streets. Important also is the 2½-year investigations of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee, which resulted in the introduction of a bill to make industrial espionage and strike-breaking violence unlawful.

5. Government Finance

"The administration has stopped deflation, restored values, and enabled business to go ahead with confidence. * * * In reviving national income we have fortified Government finance. We have raised the public credit to a position of unsurpassed security. * * * Our retrenchment, tax, and recovery programs reflect our firm determination to achieve a balanced Budget and reduction of the national debt at the earliest possible moment."

Government spending to increase purchasing power resulted in the largest absolute rise in national income for any 4-year period in our history, from 1933 to 1937, from $42,000,000,000 to $72,000,000,000—a 69 percent increase. Marked progress was made toward a balanced Budget. This was followed by a temporary recession, which has now been overcome. The increase in the national income over 1932 for the year 1939 alone was far in excess of the total increase in the national debt for the whole period since 1933.

That the small investor has complete confidence in our Government's financial condition was evidenced by the fact that January 1940 saw sales of United States savings bonds (baby bonds) mount to the unprecedented figure of $266,822,179, or more than was sold during the last 10 months of 1935 when the bonds were first offered.

6. Foreign Policy

(a) "In our relationship with other nations this Government will continue to extend the policy of the good neighbor."

From the good-neighbor ideal has sprung a spirit of continental solidarity, increasingly evident following a series of inter-American conferences, at Buenos Aires in December 1936; at Lima, Peru, December 1938; and the war emergency meeting of foreign ministers at Panama last September. A new and promising, yet logical, outgrowth of efforts to promote political harmony is the interest in cultural sharing between American peoples.

(b) "We reaffirm our opposition to war as an instrument of national policy. We shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others; to guard against being drawn * * * into any war which may develop anywhere."

War has developed and, with it, closest adherence to the above declaration. This is shown by the fact that the United States is not being drawn into any foreign armed conflict; that the administration has steadily exerted itself to promote the cause of world peace and is resolute in endeavoring to bring about more peaceful conditions when existing hostilities cease.

The Neutrality Act of the special session of 1939 put commerce with belligerents on a "title and carry" basis, and made regulations which would minimize danger of incidents which lead to war.

(c) "We shall continue to foster the increase in our foreign trade which has been achieved by this administration; to seek by mutual agreement the lowering of those tariff barriers, quotas, and embargoes which have been raised against our exports of agricultural and industrial products; but continue as in the past to give adequate protection to our farmers and manufacturers against unfair competition or the dumping on our shores of commodities and goods produced abroad by cheap labor or subsidized by foreign governments."

Since the reciprocal trade agreements program was launched in 1934, 22 such agreements have been concluded, representing about 60 percent of this country's total foreign trade. In these agreements valuable concessions have been obtained for literally hundreds of agricultural and nonagricultural products. Since 1934 exports have been increased by a billion dollars, or 46 percent, a 61-percent increase to trade-agreement countries as against a 38-percent increase to other countries. Duties have been reduced only to countries agreeing to accord better treatment to American exports; and only to the extent in which such adjustments would not be prejudicial to any established branch of industry in this country.

The final pronouncement in the 1936 platform holds true for the Democratic Party today: "That the interests, the security, and the happiness of the people of the United States of America can be perpetuated only under democratic government as conceived by the founders of our Nation.

Mr. AUSTIN obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, it is a rare coincidence that a Senator from Vermont should have the opportunity to express before the United States Senate his appreciation and gratitude to a Senator from Kentucky who is the floor leader of the majority of the Senate. The mere fact that the record which has been so eloquently set forth was made by a Kentucky Senator is a matter of pleasure to me.

Mr. President, Vermont owes Kentucky something which I take this public occasion to acknowledge. For 14 years Vermont was an independent republic, but her independence was not recognized either by the Continental Congress or by the Congress created by the Constitution, and she was not admitted into the Union until 1791. Indeed Vermont might have remained in a state of independence to this day had not Kentucky got ready to come into the Union. Thereupon it was seen by the statesmen of that time that it was well to have a northern State admitted into the Union; and so all opposition was withdrawn, and Vermont was admitted into the Union along with Kentucky. I believe Vermont was first in order, but that is not of great importance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was about to suggest to my friend that I have always understood Vermont came in as the fourteenth State and Kentucky as the fifteenth, in part because Vermont was a little more rapid in getting here than Kentucky, although the Kentucky resolution was previously passed. I compliment my friend and his State by saying that ever since that time it has been extremely difficult for us to get ahead of or even to keep up with Vermont. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I appreciate those complimentary remarks, coming as they do from a Senator from a great horse State. Kentucky is famous for her thoroughbreds, and Vermont is famous for the Morgan horse.

There is a very sweet memory connected with the two States, and that is that two stripes were added to Old Glory, representing Kentucky and Vermont, and remained on the flag for a number of years, until it was seen that such procedure could not long be continued; and then they were taken from the flag, reducing the number of stripes to the original 13.

I was very much pleased at the reference to Abraham Lincoln in the RECORD of the past 7 years, because it seems to me that one from a State which gave birth to the founder of the Republican Party is chivalrous and fair when he publicly praises that great statesman, particularly in connection with the record of the New Deal. Here again we have the strange coincidence that Vermont contemporaneously produced Stephen A. Douglas, and the two great protagonists ultimately came together upon fundamental principles. It will be recalled that Douglas, a Democrat from Vermont, defeated Lincoln, a Republican from Kentucky, for the Senate, and subsequently, in 1860, Lincoln, the Republican of Kentucky, defeated Douglas, the Democrat from Vermont.

Mr. President, I do not need to recall these coincidences to justify what I am about to say, and that is that, from the point of view of a Senator, almost a freshman Senator, and from the point of view of a slight responsibility here as assistant minority leader, I have reason to be thankful, indeed, to the distinguished floor leader of the majority for his unfailing chivalry and courtesy, notwithstanding we have been bitterly opposed upon a great many issues in the short time I have been here.

I commend him for his service as leader of the majority in creating that record in which, I must confess, he seems to take some pleasure, and if it gives him pleasure, certainly I will not stand here and detract, unless properly, from any of the particular things he mentioned as justifying his gratitude for what has been done and perhaps for the termination of the service.

In any event, Mr. President, if this, indeed, is the valedictory of the New Deal, then I do not stand here and undertake to point out the cost in money and principles of such achievements as give the Senator from Kentucky the pleasure he has expressed. My principal purpose in rising is to say that if this is the valedictory of the New Deal, then let us have an administration that will accomplish some, at least, of the following things:

Let that administration assume that the Republic is competent to govern; let it increase faith in and devotion to fundamentals; and let it adapt and adjust legislation and the performance of the executive duties to the slow tempo and to the checks and limitations of republican government.

Mr. President, I believe I heard a distinguished statesman say last night on a radio forum that the New Deal started out at a period when the people of this country had lost faith, and that the New Deal was necessary and was the product of a stimulus. To my mind that is exceedingly unfortunate. It is bad to propose such ideas. It is bad to coin such a phrase as "the forgotten man." It is bad to indoctrinate the youth of America with such an expression as "the more abundant life," to soften their character with extravagant promises of support by the Government, and to weaken their patriotism and their determination to support the Government. We have arrived at a time, at the end of 7 years of the New Deal, when we are confronted by legislation, not merely by the declaration of a new Secretary of the Navy which embodies this idea, but by legislation proposed here in the United States Senate that would concentrate in the great Government at Washington, and in the executive branch of that Government, control over all the resources of this Nation; require a census of all the wealth of the country as a whole; ascertain the net wealth of the United States of America, and compel, under the threat of compulsion, of imprisonment and fine, a return by the citizens of this country of their assets and liabilities. For what? For the purpose expressed in the bill, to make forced loans—a step backward in history to the days of Charles I.

Why do we contemplate such declarations by the members of the Cabinet of the New Deal and such legislation in the Congress? Is it not because there is a feeling in this administration, which has been propagated throughout the United States of America, that democracy will not work longer; that its processes are too slow; that there are so many checks and limitations upon democracy that they must be swept aside, and swept aside not by the means prescribed by the people; namely, an amendment of the fundamental law which creates this structure of government called our Republic, but swept aside by the simple act of adopting a proposed law in Congress by a majority of both Houses of the Congress and approved by the President of the United States?

So, Mr. President, the very first demand I would make of whatever administration shall succeed the New Deal is that it assume that this Republic is still competent to govern and that whatever progress it accomplishes, economically, socially, and politically, it proceed under the safeguards and protection afforded to the people by themselves in a written Constitution, in a declaration of rights. This is more important, in my opinion, than any other one objective as we go to the polls in a new election.

Mr. President, if we are to preserve the Republic, we must also find economic recovery. The financial welfare of our people is absolutely essential to the preservation of a free form of government. Further distress, greater depression, would force us still further to concentrate in Washington and in the Chief Executive of the United States powers over production and manufacturing and mining and merchandising, lowering the standard of living, reducing the diet of every citizen of this country, in order that we could get through without starvation. So I declare that the preservation of the Republic depends upon recovery economically.

Among the things that I would want the successor of the New Deal to do and, perhaps, do first, in order to bring about such a recovery would be to solve the monetary question that confronts us, not merely as that question is affected by the metallic content of the dollar; not merely as it involves the query whether our dollar has a redeemer that liveth; but as it comprehends a fair opportunity for business and for agriculture.

I have no doubt, after years of observing, that pending the time when we can solve our monetary question, pending the time when we can make the necessary tariff adjustments agriculture should be supported and aided, and, I say frankly, subsidized, in order that by furnishing a good opportunity for agriculture and business to get together, the value in our market of agricultural products may be brought to a parity with the value of the products of our factories.

Mr. President, I think the successor to the New Deal should proceed forthwith to put our economic house in condition to meet the inevitable strains of war and post-war days. It should free hoarded gold and silver so as to permit their use and ownership as money. It should provide unified management of credit and money; and, as a specific and early act of legislation, should create a monetary commission to study our current monetary problems. If I am correctly informed, it is 27 years—nearly 28 years—since we had a monetary commission go into this important economic question. Four days ago—namely, on February 29—the Congress passed, and 2 days ago, I am informed, the President approved by his signature, the bill increasing the capital of the Export-Import Bank by $100,000,000. There probably will be a credit of $20,000,000 to Finland, and $20,000,000 to China, to be spent in the United States for nonmilitary supplies. This, in my opinion, is but a straw on the surface of stream of world movement. The United States is the only place in the world where credit adequate to run world wars is available. I am appalled at the thought, but I cannot black it out of my mind, that we are victims to the extent of at least involuntary help of all belligerents, and voluntary help of the belligerents who appear to us to be oppressed by aggressors where war has not been declared. Moreover, we are forced into an attitude of self-defense. We fear the triumph of autocracy in Europe and Asia might result in the destruction of our own free institutions.

Money management by the United States is connected with war and domestic problems.

This war is being fought with checks and hindrances of commerce, not only in the nature of blockades but also in the nature of embargoes. The movement of trade may determine a war today. Money and machinery as well as food and clothing constitute the effective weapons now in greatest use. At all times hereafter they will also be vitally important. All money of the world is anchored on the dollar. Therefore, our responsibility extends beyond our own recovery from depression—which is enough to make us perform our trust well—to establish confidence in the stability and future value of money. Our management of money will react upon the whole world.

We now have managed money. It is somewhat disorganized, but management is in operation. On one hand the Federal Reserve Board, which has been in operation 25 years, controls rediscounting, conducts open-market operations, and makes changes in reserve requirements. These are the mechanisms of money management. Make no mistake about that. The doubling of reserve requirements in 1917, for example, nipped in the bud the upward turn of business and started deflation again. We are not able to say whether that rise was or was not the beginning of a real inflation. Perhaps their decision was right. Perhaps not. But we know that management then was substituted for automatic limitation.

On another hand, the President has managerial powers:

First, to fix the metallic content of the dollar; second, to issue unsecured greenbacks, and third, to buy silver and gold.

And again, fourth, there is the use of the stabilization fund to deal in gold or securities.

I am not certain that we could, if we would, return to the monetary system of the past, which depended on automatic checks to overexpansion, such as shortage of money. I do not believe, however, that elastic credit and currency is likely to be wisely and effectively managed if left, as it is now, subject to political pressures.

The machinery for management ought to be made as nearly ideal as humanly possible. Certainly management should be harmonized, unified, and made coherent. The existing confusion caused by division of authority between different divisions and departments of government ought to be eliminated.

No section of the country, no private interests, no political or partisan power, should control it. Independence from the Executive should be aimed at, and might be attained to a similar degree as in the office of the Comptroller General.

This is as far as I can visualize changes in the mechanism which I think would improve our management of money.

There are other complexities in the situation, however, which suggest that management itself should be limited, simplified, and improved.

We have $5,000,000,000 of excess reserves—much more than required by the doubling order of 1937. This is partly the consequence of the influx of gold from abroad. Three billion dollars of these reserve deposits accrued this year. If business should develop and call for all of this in loans put into commercial bank deposits, we could have an expansion of bank credit by fifteen to twenty billion dollars, without the exercise of the managerial powers of government. Speculation, rising costs of living, succeeded by depression, would naturally result.

But picture the possibility of further inflation and subsequent deflation inherent in the existence of these powers:

First. Further devaluation of the gold dollar;

Second. Release of the gold in the stabilization fund;

Third. Maximum legal valuation of silver, $2.58 an ounce, now worth about 43 cents, and Fourth. Issuance of greenbacks, $3,000,000,000.

Revival of business could be a fuse leading to the gunpowder stored here.

The stock in trade of money handlers is credit. Banks are vendors of credit. Self-interest and pressure from applicants would be adequate to ignite the fuse.

To the $17,600,000,000 of gold now in our control and management, additions are coming and will continue to come for some time after the war ends. This potential purchasing or losing power—depending upon events without control—also dictates that we should straighten out the problem of management as soon as practicable.

It seems clear to me that it is not in the interest of the United States especially, nor of the world, that this monstrous property should be scaled down in value. Such action would be expensive. It would increase our public debt.

To stop buying would have that effect.

To lower the price would have that effect.

Moreover, I object to raising the price, because that changes the value of the national currency, to the great damage of every payee of contracts, every holder of an insurance policy, and every owner of a savings account, and sends a tremor of fear through the entire country. Debasement of the dollar further is something to avoid if there is any better manner of performance of our trust.

It is safer for numerous people to hoard gold than for the Government to do so. I believe the idea involved is that, though out of sight, gold in the private holdings of the people forms a ready emergency reserve for future use and reduces proportionately the menace of excess reserves. To bring this about would necessitate removal of restrictions on private possession; it would require resumption of specie payments, coining gold, and putting coins into circulation. The plan would include negotiable gold certificates, and payments for new gold with such certificates or gold coin. In international relations it would establish a free gold market. These are my views regarding repeal of the monetary powers of the President and releasing gold as I have sketched, in relation to the valuation, with reference to the dollar, which it now has.

Mr. President, there is a story which I think is true, that when Cotton Mather died Ben Franklin wrote to Cotton Mather's son and said: "You probably know that your father and I did not get along very well together, and I have owed your father a debt for a long time and regret that he passed away before I paid it. So I now write you in order to relieve my remorse. One time I was calling on your father and he took me into his printing plant, underground, through a corridor which was very low, and I bumped my head on a beam. He turned to me and said, 'Ben, stoop a little going through life; it will save you many a bump.'"

Mr. President, I have stated my views with the distinct mental reservation which I now express, namely, that I have no special knowledge of the monetary subject, but the more I have studied it the more I have discovered that experts disagree among themselves about the solution of this problem. Therefore what I have said here today, and the hope I have expressed with reference to the administration which will succeed the New Deal, is for the purpose of stimulating thought and of bringing about this immediate action, namely, the creation of a Monetary Commission which will qualify itself, if it is not already qualified, to advise the Congress of the United States what to do with respect to our monetary problem.

Mr. President, I expect that one of the first acts of Congress under the administration which will succeed the New Deal will be to assert its power and perform its duty to regulate the value of money. That is a primary power. It belongs to sovereignty. Without it sovereignty could not defend itself in war; without it sovereignty could not maintain itself in peace. It is not a subsidiary power that is subject to delegation, and when we delegated that power to the Chief Executive we delegated the power to do something the obligation to do which had been placed upon us by the people. So I declare that I should want the successor of the New Deal among its very first acts to assert its power and perform its duty to regulate and control the value of the money of this country.

Mr. President, I have consumed more time than I had intended to originally. I shall now briefly, and rather categorically, set forth several other acts which I should like to see the successor of the New Deal perform.

First, I should like to see it create such conditions—political conditions, which are within the power of the Government to create—that each State may carry its own responsibility in confidence of enjoying self-determination and autonomy.

If there is any one thing I have discovered in returning home, it is that the people of my State, and those of other States which I have visited, look with great fear upon the aggression which Washington has already made upon the governments of the individual States, such as control of public policy through the use of the spending power, actual exercise of police power, and seizure of the natural resources of the several States. Many of the States of the Union I know favor the idea of accepting Federal money and surrendering natural resources. We have witnessed that. But my State does not; and other States of which I know have great apprehension that the control of their natural resources may go out of their hands by virtue of the exercise of the spending power of the Federal Government.

Next, I would have the administration which is to succeed the New Deal assure the people that their legislative power, the people's legislative power, exercised through their representatives in the Congress of the United States, shall henceforth be exercised without coercion from the Executive Department.

Next, I would have that administration give peace of mind, if it could, to anxious people, by assuring them that the Executive authority in conducting foreign relations will not be trespassed upon by the legislative department, and assure to them the continuance of peace between the United States and its neighbors by virtue of the legislative control of the purse strings and of the sword.

Next, I would have that administration, if it could, consolidate the moral defenses of freedom by the certainty that the judicial department will not be brought under subjection, intimidation, or dependence by either the executive or the legislative department.

The sanctuary of the citizen, when pursued by his government, must be kept inviolate.

Again, Mr. President, I would affirmatively and boldly promote the capitalistic system. In examining witnesses from time to time I have found distinguished leaders of thought not merely expressing the suspicion that the capitalistic system was a failure, but some of them expressly asserting that the capitalistic system is a failure. It is time that we put a stop to the opprobrius shame which has been plastered over the words, "the capitalistic system," and hold it up before the world as the basis upon which the United States of America became and still is the leader of all the world, economically and socially, and, I think, under present conditions, spiritually.

Let that administration encourage the payment of wages to capital as well as to labor. Let it favor daring adventure, the taking of chances, on the sound foundation of a stable government which does not bend every energy to reform and change, and which tries to substitute something new, only because it is new, for the old with which we have succeeded in the past.

Let us improve, let us make progress; but let us give to those who are the starters of business, the initiators of the production of wealth, the people whose accounts are in our savings banks and in our insurance companies and other places where they are now hoarded and withheld from investment, encouragement to believe that a contract made tomorrow will be good a hundred years from tomorrow. Let them realize that their Government is not favoring one class against another, creating prejudices and hatreds and stirring up strife and disorder between employer and employee.

If these things are done, Mr. President, we will see the vaults of the banks open and the wheels of the factories begin to turn, and we will see unemployment decrease at a rate which will be astonishing. We will not need to wait 5 long years for it, nor will we have to plunge this country $20,000,000,000 more into debt to accomplish it. We will substitute for public spending the private investment of capital, which is the great reservoir of capital and the stimulus of the production of wealth in every country on earth.

Mr. President, reverting to the subject of unemployment, I ask Senators if they do not think it is about time that we got onto a sound, fundamental basis? Does anyone think that, given recovery, given a stimulation of investment, we can have restoration and reequalization of employment if we do not have good will between employer and employee? There is nothing more important for the preservation of the Republic, through restoration of prosperity, than the reestablishment of relations between employer and employee upon a good spiritual basis. The Golden Rule is as good a rule as I know of for the solution of our unemployment problem. I believe I see signs of a trend in that direction. As I have returned to my neighbors who are engaged in business and employ labor on farms and in factories, I begin to see a disposition to recognize the social aspects of business and production. Men have really changed in their attitude in recent years. If that is a part of the stimulus of the New Deal, let us give the New Deal praise for it. I would not withhold it.

Let me say, Mr. President, that when I speak of the future and of that administration which will in all probability succeed the New Deal, I do not denounce everything the New Deal has done. There are many things about it which I praise. I would frankly subsidize agriculture, as I have already said. I think the soil-conservation program, which has in it a detail of control of waters at their sources and the reproduction of forests for the creation of great reservoirs which will check and hold back and keep the water as a supply for farm production through the valleys and the intervening land, is a technique for agriculture which should be carried on with prudence, but with hearty good will by the successor of the New Deal.

But, in passing, I ask whose idea is this matter of conservation, anyway? Let no man here credit the New Deal with the idea of conservation of natural resources. It has been the object of the United States Government for many years. Some distinguished Senators whom I am honored by having the opportunity to address today have been advocates of it for a long life in the Congress of the United States.

There is another suggestion I may make. I should hope that the successor of the New Deal would maintain, improve if possible, and broaden the benefits of social security and the assurance of a fair chance of every living being to provide against want in old age through his own thrift, made effective, made possible, by Government cooperation.

Mr. President, I am about to close. If the remarkably excellent résumé of the record of the New Deal by the distinguished leader of the majority is the valedictory of the New Deal, let the administration that succeeds it have an attitude of friendliness toward all the lawful activities of our people. Let it not frown upon, let it not compete with, let it not regulate to the point of control and management the activities of our people.

Our republican institutions were designed to give freedom of contract and freedom of action, and, under the blessings of such institutions, we have prospered. It is true that we have had recurrent depressions. We ought to have acquired sufficient information about them to know the causes and, if possible, to overcome them. In any event, I believe that we can minimize the depths and lower the heights and thus level off, perchance, the road of progress of the American people economically, but we can never accomplish such an objective if we continue the New Deal theory of picking out organized groups and holding them up before the world as paragons and as the forgotten group and giving them special advantages over other groups.

Let the administration which succeeds the New Deal be fair and just to all enterprise. Let the word go out among the 130,000,000 people in this country that they have an administration in Washington which will regulate commerce only to that minimum degree that is consistent with the maximum of fair competition and we will see a recovery in the United States of America that will not merely preserve the Republic but will put the United States in the proper position to meet the impact and the burdens that must inevitably face it as a consequence of the destruction of property, life, economy, and social relations all over the world.

We have a great trust, and I have no doubt at all of our ability to perform it. I have no fear that a republic such as ours cannot continue many hundred years in the future to progress as it has in the past, without revolutionizing and overturning and subverting the very principles on which we have acquired all that we have and made all the advance that has marked our national life.

Mr. President, I wish to conclude by referring to the constitution of that little garden 200 miles long and 75 miles wide, called the State of Vermont one article of which contains language something like this:

> A frequent recurrence to fundamental principles and a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and industry, are absolutely necessary for the preservation of liberty and to keep government free.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, as we recall conditions in our Nation on March 4, 1933, after 12 years of Republican administration, and survey conditions in the United States today after 7 years of Democratic administration, we see that the country is infinitely better off today than it was on March 4, 1933. The majority leader, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], has admirably reviewed the achievements of this administration.

I have before me a short article from the New York Times of March 3, 1940, written by Turner Catledge, giving a description of conditions in this country 7 years ago. It is not my description, but a description published by the New York Times, entitled "A Memorable Day," which I read:

> Few people who lived in Washington will ever forget the New Deal's natal day. That day dawned a dark one in every respect. The great depression hung over the country like a darkening cloud. Banks were closing literally by the hundreds. Life savings in bank accounts and securities were being blown away like so much dust. Homes and farms were going on the auction block in ever-increasing numbers. In certain sections citizens were beginning to grow desperate. Word reached Washington that morning of hungry people raiding a food store in one community in the Southwest. In another State, only a few days before, irate citizens had forcibly stopped a foreclosure sale, and in another they had actually dragged a judge from the bench and threatened to tar and feather him for carrying out the State law in declaring the forfeit on a farmer's mortgage.

As I have said this is not my description but the description of that memorable day as told by the New York Times in its issue of yesterday.

Mr. President, speeches are now being made from the stump, in the forum, and on the air by those of the political faith which espouses the policies which brought about the economic paralysis which existed on March 4, 1933, pleading that we return to the governmental policies responsible for the desperate economic conditions with which we are familiar. I ask those who hear such speeches and words going out over the radio to stop and think, and to harken to the admonition that a plague once suffered has its own warnings.

When we recall the bread lines of hungry, desperate men, the burning of grain for fuel, business in bankruptcy, banks failing, and desolation and despair everywhere, we today should give thanks to an administration which has relieved us of those conditions and given us days of prosperity and contentment.

Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

EXTENSION OF ANTIPERNICIOUS POLITICAL ACTIVITIES ACT

Mr. HATCH and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma addressed the Chair.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that my only purpose in rising at this time is to ask that Senate bill 3046 be made the unfinished business. It is not my intention to speak now. I understood that the Senator from Oklahoma intended to speak at this time. I wish to take only a moment to ask that Senate bill 3046 be made the unfinished business.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HILL. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it was understood on Thursday that Senate bill 3046 was to be made the unfinished business of the Senate. I do not think that has actually been done as yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been done.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 3046.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on that question, I desire to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 3046. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I object.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 3046.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is debatable. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to be heard?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to beg the pardon of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hill]. At the conclusion of his eloquent preoration I thought he was taking his seat, and with that understanding I addressed the Chair. I in no sense desire to take him from the floor or to embarrass him. I merely desire to preserve my right to obtain the floor at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I thoroughly understand the Senator's position. To be perfectly frank with the Senator from Oklahoma, and with the Senate, I had concluded all the remarks I had in mind to address to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is not within the power of any Senator to yield to another Senator when he desires to relinquish the floor. For that reason I addressed the Chair.

Let me now say to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico that I have no objection whatever to his motion, but I do desire to be heard at this time upon another matter. That is the reason why I have made my suggestion that I desire to be heard upon his motion.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. What is the question pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Mexico that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 3046.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. When was that motion made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the Senator from New Mexico was recognized by the Chair, following the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think I addressed the Chair and was recognized when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] announced that he had not concluded. I desire to keep the RECORD straight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, is that motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is debatable.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma obtained the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that there is no intention on my part to take the floor from the Senator from Oklahoma, or to deprive him of his opportunity to be heard. If my motion in any way interferes with what the Senator has in mind, I am perfectly willing to withdraw it and renew my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I had served notice on the Presiding Officer that I desired recognition following the conclusion of the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a correct statement.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I desire to keep the RECORD straight. I have no objection to the motion of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, and at the conclusion of my remarks I shall have no objection to having his motion put.

Mr. HATCH. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico first asked unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 3046, and objection was heard to that request.

The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

PROPOSAL FOR WORLD BANK

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a few days ago I had something to say relative to our present gold policy. At that time I admitted that the present rate of gold acquisition by the United States was not in the best interests of either our country or the other countries of the world.

In my remarks in the Senate on February 15, I suggested some possible remedies. One was to coin our gold and place it in circulation; another was to organize a world bank for the special purpose of securing a redistribution of our surplus gold among the solvent nations and governments of the world.

Gold is the one and only commodity which is universally recognized and accepted as basic and primary money by all central banks and governments; hence, gold is money, and the only real money in the world.

There is and can be no disagreement over the formula that the best interests of peoples, governments, and nations demand that the gold of the world be fairly distributed among the several nations and governments, to be used by them as a basis for their exchange and for the stabilization of their monetary units in the monetary system of the world.

Nations trade with each other, in the main, by an exchange of goods and services, but unless nations are to be forced upon a purely barter basis they must have or be able to secure gold to adjust balances between and among such countries as presume to trade in the markets of the world.

Mr. President, what are the facts which seem to make such statements not only appropriate but in my opinion absolutely necessary at this time?

The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System reported in their bulletin of date January 1940 that the known monetary gold in the world was some $27,798,000,000; and that of this amount on February 28 of this year the United States owned and had in its possession the sum of $18,166,000,000.

If the foregoing figures are approximately correct, they show that one country, the United States, possesses $18,166,000,000, while the other 52 governments together own and possess only some $9,632,000,000.

The issue of the Federal Reserve bulletin which I have mentioned likewise discloses the fact that as we increase our monetary stock of gold a corresponding decrease is being made in the holdings of most if not all of the other nations of the world.

For example, in December of 1934 France owned some $5,445,000,000 in gold, while in November of 1939 France had remaining only some $3,191,000,000, thus showing a loss of French gold holdings in the sum of $2,254,000,000.

In December of 1934 Italy was reported to have held $518,000,000 in gold, while in November of 1939 this amount had been reduced to $193,000,000.

On the same dates Japan had $394,000,000 in gold, later reduced to $164,000,000.

The report further shows that on the former date Germany had $32,000,000 in gold and on the latter date only $29,000,000.

On the former date Spain had $740,000,000 and on the latter date only $525,000,000.

For the RECORD I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point a statement showing the gold reserves of central banks and governments as of date November 1939.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

		2,311,000,000
Total		27,798,000,000

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the report submitted by the Federal Reserve System shows that during the past 12 months we have received a total of $3,278,000,000 in gold, and, of course, this gold came from the other nations of the earth, save perhaps the comparatively small amount which was mined in the United States and in our possessions.

This shows that during the past year we have been receiving gold at the rate of approximately $280,000,000 a month, or some $70,000,000 a week.

During the week ending February 28, our receipts were $58,000,000.

During the week ending February 21, our receipts were $45,000,000.

The same Federal Reserve report shows that the production of gold throughout the world, outside of Russia, is as follows:

1929	$352,000,000
1930	365,000,000
1931	386,000,000
1932	413,000,000
1933	411,000,000

The foregoing figures are based upon the former gold dollar containing a weight of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine.

In 1933 the United States authorized the devaluation of the gold dollar, and in 1934 the weight of such dollar was reduced from its former gold content to 15 5/21 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine; hence, on the basis of the devalued dollar, the world production in:

1934	$707,000,000
1935	751,000,000
1936	833,000,000
1937	892,000,000
1938	957,000,000
1939 (estimated)	1,000,000,000

From the foregoing figures it is seen that world gold production is increasing at an approximate rate of some 3½ percent per annum.

With the increase of population, the increase of taxes, and the increase of debt, it is estimated that it is necessary to have gold produced at the rate of approximately 3 percent per annum in order to take care of the added demands for gold.

If the figures herein given are approximately correct—namely, a total world supply of monetary gold at this time in the sum of $28,000,000,000; second, gold produced annually in the sum of $1,000,000,000; and, third, the amount coming to the United States in the sum of $3,290,000,000 annually, then within approximately 3 years all the monetary gold in the world will have been sent to and will be in the custody of the Treasury of the United States. If this should happen, the other nations would be without gold and would be unable to secure gold with which either to measure property values or to be used in the adjustment of international balances.

Further, if this should happen, the following results would be obvious:

First, that the demand for gold among the other nations would be so great that what little gold could be secured would be so valuable in terms of property that prices of such property in such countries as measured in gold would be reduced to unthinkable and impossible prices.

Second, if nations could not get gold with which to support their exchange, then such nations would be forced either to adopt some other commodity as the basis of their exchange, or would be forced to a complete barter basis.

When the effects of the present trend are considered it should be obvious to those in responsible positions that something not only should but must be done to avert a calamity if not chaos among the trading nations of the world.

The coining of our gold and placing it in circulation either in the payment of governmental expenses or the retiring of governmental obligations will, in my opinion, be too slow to afford the relief that must be provided. A plan must be devised and placed in force to provide procedure for the other nations of the world to secure on fair and equitable conditions the necessary gold to support their necessary exchange in order to enable such nations to continue on a trading world-wide basis.

BILL PROPOSING WORLD BANK

In order to bring this question before the Congress and to suggest a possible plan, I have prepared and now ask permission to introduce a bill entitled "A bill to provide for the expansion of the foreign trade of the United States and the stabilization of currencies through the redistribution of gold, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3510) to provide for the expansion of the foreign trade of the United States and the stabilization of currencies through the redistribution of gold, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In brief, the bill just introduced by me proposes to expand the power and functions of the existing Export-Import Bank of Washington to the end that such bank may either sell or loan any portion of our surplus gold to approved central banks and governments of the other several nations of the earth.

The expanded bank would in effect be a world bank under the direct management of the Federal Loan Administrator and the functions of the bank would be under the supervision of a board to consist of the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

The bill further provides that the proceeds from the sale of any of our surplus gold shall be deposited in the general fund of the Treasury. Also, all profits from the loan of gold shall likewise be covered into the general fund of the Treasury.

WORLD MONETARY UNIT

To the end that gold would not lose its place, importance, and value as a monetary metal, and, further, in order that the world may have a single monetary unit, the bill provides for the coinage of a portion of our surplus gold into gold coins containing 1 ounce of pure gold, which means that said coin would contain 480 grains of pure gold, troy weight, and 533 7/21 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine.

Before the recent gold dollar devaluation, gold was valued at $20.67 per fine ounce. At that time we had in circulation $20 gold coins, which meant that a $20 gold coin contained approximately 1 ounce of pure gold.

If the suggested plan for gold coins should be adopted, then a coin containing a full ounce of pure gold would be only a small fraction larger than the former $20 gold piece, but under the present valuation such gold coin would be valued at $35.

It is obvious to all that the value of gold in terms of dollars is arrived at through the amount of gold contained in the dollar.

The present statutory gold dollar contains 15 5/21 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, which means that such dollar contains approximately 13¾ grains of pure gold.

It was obviously the intent of the President to fix the content of the new gold dollar at such a weight as would serve the best interests of all our people and all our interests.

By dividing the weight of an ounce of pure gold by the number of grains of pure gold in the dollar, we find that the quotient is 35, hence a gold ounce is worth $35.

From the beginning of our Government until 1873 we used both gold and silver as either the money of account or as the basis for the issuance of the money of account.

From 1873 until 1900 the question of whether or not we would continue to use both gold and silver or go to the single gold standard was uppermost in the public mind.

In 1900 the Congress provided that we should go to the single gold standard, and since that time the United States has used only gold as basic and primary money.

If the other nations cannot retain what gold they have and cannot thereafter secure additional gold, then such nations will be forced to adopt some other commodity as a basis for at least their exchange.

If this should happen the gold which we will have assembled might not be in great demand and in that event our Government would stand to lose a vast amount of value.

If the thing suggested should happen, we would find the present 2,000,000,000 peoples of the earth in about as primitive a condition with regard to money as were their forefathers thousands of years ago.

Under present world conditions there is only one nation that has the opportunity of even making suggestions for a solution of this problem, and that nation is our own United States.

EFFORT TO SOLVE PROBLEM

Mr. President, upon what official or department of government rests the responsibility for solving or trying to solve this all-important problem?

What official or department of Government has either made suggestions or submitted a possible solution or remedy for the present rapidly developing monetary chaos if not a national and world-wide calamity?

The answer is none; neither official nor department.

Ten years ago when the great depression fell upon us and the other nations untied their monetary units from gold and thereby devalued their money in terms of gold, what did the managers of our money do? The answer is nothing, and thereby, calamity came to the Government; the banks, the people, and, incidentally, to one of the great political parties of the United States.

Mr. President, shall history repeat itself in the year 1940?

The facts about present conditions and present trends are or should be known best by our money managers, and these money managers are the Department of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

Have we any recommendations or suggestions from either of these departments? Insofar as my knowledge goes, the answer is—no.

In this matter history is repeating itself. Ten years ago when we were drifting toward economic bankruptcy what suggestion for relief came to the Congress from the said departments or from any source? The only suggestion that came from any source outside of the Congress was stand pat. We stood pat and the calamity came.

Mr. President, we, the Congress, cannot step aside, we cannot put aside, we cannot escape the responsibility that rests upon us with regard to our monetary and financial system.

The Congress is responsible for the single gold standard and monetary system we now have. We know that the monetary systems of the world are likewise based upon the single gold standard. We know that there is only some $28,000,000,000 of monetary gold in all the world. We know that, of this gold, we now have some $18,200,000,000. We know that gold is coming to us at the rate of over two hundred millions per month, and that at such rate all the monetary gold in the world will have been sent here in the next 3 or 4 years.

Again I ask—should this happen what would be the conditions facing not only our country but the other countries of the earth?

Mr. President, the bill I have just introduced has for its objective, the formation of a program for meeting the issue I have sought to define. I am not seeking to stop the gold from coming to America, but after such gold or money arrives here, I am suggesting a plan for its use and redistribution.

To work out the details I am calling upon what should be the best financial brains in our country.

I suggest the creation of what may be called a world bank. This will be an expansion of the existing Export-Import Bank, and shall have for its additional objectives:

First. The redistribution of our surplus gold.

Second. The stabilization of currencies.

Third. The expansion of world trade.

Fourth. The introduction and establishment of the gold ounce as a world monetary unit.

Fifth. The use of our financial and economic power as an influence for permanent peace among the nations of the earth.

Mr. President, under the Constitution, which all patriotic Americans profess to support and uphold, we find that the Congress is the policy-making branch of our Government. The Congress, being the policy-making branch, has the exclusive power and jurisdiction to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. The bill which I have introduced has for its purpose the carrying out of the powers conferred upon the Congress by the Constitution.

As a part of my remarks, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill as introduced be printed at this point in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3510) is as follows:

A bill to provide for the expansion of the foreign trade of the United States and the stabilization of currencies through the redistribution of gold, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of aiding in financing and facilitating exports and imports and the exchange of commodities between the United States and any of its Territories and insular possessions and any foreign country or the agencies or nationals thereof, and for the purposes of assisting in the stabilization of the value of the dollar and other currencies, promoting the cooperation of central banks, and providing additional facilities for international financial objectives, the Export-Import Bank of Washington is authorized and empowered, in addition to its existing charter and statutory powers, to exercise the functions hereinafter provided by this act. Such functions shall be exercised under the direction and supervision of a board of management (thereinafter referred to as the "Board") consisting of the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and the Federal Loan Administrator who shall be the executive manager for the said Board in carrying out the special functions of the said Export-Import Bank as herein provided. The said Board is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying out its functions and those of the Export-Import Bank of Washington under this act. The members of the Board shall receive no additional compensation for their services as such members.

SEC. 2. (a) With the approval of the Board, and subject to such terms, conditions, and limitations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as the Board may prescribe and notwithstanding any existing provisions of law, the Export-Import Bank of Washington is authorized and empowered, on behalf of the United States—

(1) to sell any unobligated or unencumbered gold coin or bullion belonging to the United States;

(2) to make loans of any such gold coin or bullion to the central banks of foreign countries upon such security as the Board may approve as satisfactory;

(3) to accept the custody of gold for the account of such central banks;

(4) to make advances to such central banks against gold, bills of exchange, other short-term obligations of prime liquidity, as determined by the Board, or other securities approved by the Board;

(5) to open and maintain current or deposit accounts with such central banks;

(6) to accept deposits from such central banks on current or deposit accounts;

(7) to accept deposits in connection with agreements entered into between the Export-Import Bank of Washington and such central banks for the purpose of carrying out international agreements or settlements to which the United States is a party; and

(8) to accept such other deposits as, in the opinion of the Board, will aid in accomplishing the purposes of this act.

No loan of gold shall be made under this section except to a central bank which is approved by the Board, and no such loan shall be made to any such central bank unless such bank, or the foreign government which it represents, enters into an agreement satisfactory to the Board to fix a definite gold content for the monetary unit used by such bank or government, and to maintain such monetary unit in terms of gold as a basis for all exchange transactions entered into by such bank or government.

(b) The functions of the Export-Import Bank of Washington under this act shall, so far as practicable, be exercised through its existing facilities, but the Board is authorized to provide for such additional facilities and personnel as in its opinion may be necessary to carry out such functions. The Board is authorized to employ and fix the compensation of any such additional personnel without regard to the provisions of other laws relating to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for such additional facilities and personnel.

(c) All the proceeds derived from the sale of any gold by the Export-Import Bank, and all profits derived by it from gold loans or from any of its other activities under this act, during any fiscal year, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts prior to the end of such fiscal year.

(d) The Board shall make an annual report to the Congress at the beginning of each regular session with respect to the operations of the Export-Import Bank of Washington and the activities of the Board under this act.

SEC. 3. In order to further accomplish the purposes of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and, with the approval of the Board, is directed to provide for the coinage of gold coins, in an aggregate amount not to exceed $2,000,000,000, out of any unobligated and unencumbered gold belonging to the United States: Provided, That the gold now set aside and held in the stabilization fund may be coined as herein provided. Such coins shall be of such design as the Secretary shall appprove, and each such coin shall contain 1 ounce of pure gold, or 480 grains Troy weight, and 533 7/21 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, and shall state the weight and fineness of the gold contained therein and the value thereof in dollars and shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private.

SEC. 4. In the operation of the bank as provided herein, should the Board decide that the best interests of the United States demands the sale or loan of more gold than is unobligated at the time, then such Board is authorized to secure the release of gold in the possession of the Treasury by reimbursing the Federal Reserve System or any bank in such System and thereby securing the return to the Treasury of gold certificates heretofore issued against such gold and the Treasury is hereby authorized to make payment to any such Federal Reserve bank out of any funds not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 5. All acts or parts of acts which are inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; and all proclamations, orders, rules, regulations, and other action promulgated, made, issued, or taken by the President or the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to gold shall cease to be effective on and after the date of enactment of this act to the extent that such proclamations, orders, rules, regulations, and other action are inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. The short title of this act shall be the "Surplus Gold Act of 1940."

PROPOSED ACQUISITION OF BRITISH CARIBBEAN ISLANDS AND BRITISH HONDURAS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution similar to one which this afternoon will be introduced in the House of Representatives by Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, a Representative from the State of West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received. The clerk will state the title of the joint resolution.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 221) for the acquisition of British islands in the Caribbean and British Honduras.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the joint resolution requests and empowers the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with Great Britain for the acquisition of certain possessions of Great Britain in the Caribbean and in Central America; and if, after those negotiations, an agreement can be reached by which the United States shall acquire those islands, or certain of those islands, for defense purposes, the amount agreed upon will be credited to the indebtedness of Great Britain to the United States.

At the present time Great Britain is indebted to the United States in the total sum of $5,574,430,793.82. These figures I secured on Saturday from the State Department. At the time of my inquiry the State Department advised me that the first absolute default of the British Government in its indebtedness to the United States was on June 15, 1934, while the last token payment made by the British Government to the United States was on December 15, 1933, in the sum of $7,500,000, which amount was applied to interest accumulated and past due. The present status of that debt is, principal, $4,368,000,000; interest, $1,206,430,793.82; making a total, as heretofore stated, of $5,574,430,793.82.

The principal bears interest at the rate of 3½ percent, and is due semiannually; none having been paid since June 15, 1934. In the case of the payment of $7,500,000 at that time, the British Government did not designate where it was to be applied, but I am informed by the State Department that it was applied to the interest on the principal debt.

Mr. President, but recently we have heard a great deal in reference to the protection of the locks of the Panama Canal, particularly by the President of the United States since he was fishing in waters adjacent to that point; and recently we have read a great many editorials on the subject in the newspapers of the country, and quite a good deal of mention has been made of it upon the floor of the Senate and likewise upon the floor of the House. I am thoroughly of the opinion that we should provide ourselves with an adequate, actual national defense for defense purposes only; and in making provision for adequate national defense we of course should of necessity prepare to protect the locks of the Panama Canal in order that our shipping may not be interfered with, and our fleet passing from Pacific waters to Atlantic waters. I may add at this time that once before I remarked, in making comparisons between the use of battleships and the use of battle planes, that it takes a battleship 11 days to proceed from San Francisco southward through the locks and northward in the Atlantic to New York City, whereas one of our big bombers can negotiate the distance across the continent between San Francisco and New York in 11 hours; but we are particularly interested in protecting the locks of the Panama Canal.

With that in view, we are at the present time expending a number of millions of dollars in increasing our fortifications in the immediate vicinity of San Juan, in Puerto Rico, concerning which the very able Senator from Oklahoma spoke some weeks ago after having made a visit there as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I think that is money well spent; and if we will fashion in our minds the location of the island of Puerto Rico, we will recall that it is approximately half-way between Cuba and the island of Trinidad, which is a British possession; and if we will further fashion in our minds the location of Puerto Rico we will envision it directly east of the Panama Canal itself.

In view of the fact that that is really virtually our only fortification for the protection of the locks from the Atlantic, and in view of the fact that we are the possessors of the Virgin Islands, a distance of about 60 miles from Puerto Rico—that is to say St. Thomas, the capital of the Virgin Islands, is about 60 miles from San Juan, the capital of Puerto Rico—and in view of the fact that we are maintaining friendly relations with the Dominican Republic and with the Republic of Haiti and with the Republic of Cuba I am of the opinion that we should, if we possibly can in a friendly way, acquire those islands in the arc extending from Florida to Port-of-Spain, which is the capital of Trinidad.

We have endeavored to do everything we possibly can to aid the Allies who are possessed of democratic forms of government. We have lifted the arms embargo, and we have permitted them to seize our ships in neutral waters and take them into belligerent ports. We have permitted them at sword's point and with arms at their side to confiscate, at least temporarily, our mails at Bermuda, and to hold up our ships, without a single serious protest having been issued by our State Department; all with a view of aiding, if possible, without ourselves becoming involved, the Allies in their death struggle with the totalitarian States, since we are violently opposed to totalitarianism in every form.

I think we should endeavor to help our English brothers and cousins. This is an hour when they are desperately struggling for their lives, and we can really do an act of charity at the present time by saying to them, "We want to help you. We know that you are overburdened with debts. We know that all the gold you have saved up, and all the gold you have, you are going to use for the purpose of buying implements of death at our armories here in the United States. In addition to all the troubles of the world that you have upon your shoulders, you have the debts, exceeding $5,000,000,000, that are owing and due and have remained unpaid to the United States of America for many years past."

We can help England and France at this time by saying, "We are going to lift some of these responsibilities off your shoulders; we are going to aid you by giving you an opportunity to pay your debt to us, at least a part of it, by turning over to us some property which you own in the Western Hemisphere, in the waters of the Atlantic." I suppose it could be properly so described.

I have in mind especially Bimini. Bimini is a British possession, only 50 miles from the coast of Florida. Ninety-five percent of all the tourists who go to Bimini come from the United States. Next, there is the island of Nassau, which is only about 150 miles from the coast of Florida. Then, just south of Cuba we find Jamaica, and the major part of the tourists to that island come from the United States, and, consequently, like Bimini and Nassau, Jamaica derives the greater portion of its revenue from that source.

Further southward, beyond the Virgin Islands, we find a group of islands, the Windward Islands and the Leeward Islands, which belong to Great Britain. They extend in a curve to the Port-of-Spain and the island of Trinidad, which is just a stone's throw off the coast of Venezuela in northeastern South America.

If we were possessed of those islands, extending from Florida, in that circle, to the Port-of-Spain, we then would be in an admirable position to lend strength to the fortifications which we are building at Puerto Rico; and if we should have those islands, I am confident we would entertain no fear of any attack by plane or ship or submarine from the waters of the Atlantic. But without the possession of those islands, in addition to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, and considering the friendly relations of the Dominican Republic and Haiti, there is always danger of attack by submarines or battleships or cruisers or airplanes. For that reason I think we should endeavor to make a deal, if we possibly can, by which we could acquire these islands.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I have embodied in my joint resolution British Honduras. We would not strengthen ourselves materially by acquiring the islands to which I have referred unless we at the same time acquired British Honduras, which is in Central America, adjoining the Republics of Guatemala and Nicaragua.

The area of British Honduras, according to my recollection, is about 8,000 square miles, whereas the total number of square miles in all the islands belonging to the British, including Bermuda, Jamaica, and the Windward Islands and the Leeward Islands, is about 12,000. So a total of about 20,000 square miles is involved. I hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the joint resolution no doubt will be referred, will give consideration to this matter.

I am sure that Great Britain would be glad to consult with us in regard to such a transaction, because unquestionably they recognize their debt as an honest debt, the principal of which has been considerable for a number of years, and the interest on which has been piling up from year to year. Certainly for 25 years to come they will not be able to pay anything upon the interest, much less the principal, because when the present war is over, England, like all the other countries of Europe, will be so poverty-stricken that she will not be able to pay anything. This is the time when we desire to strengthen the defenses of the Canal from the East, and I think we should endeavor to make some arrangement of a satisfactory nature.

In particular reference to Bermuda, as Senators know, Bermuda is in the Atlantic Ocean exactly 530 miles directly East from Kitty Hawk, N. C. Bermuda is now being used as one of the stopping points of the trans-Atlantic planes flying to Lisbon, Portugal, and, as I stated a moment ago, we have experienced some difficulty due to the seizure and censoring of our mail. I may add, in that connection, that, as most of my colleagues know, we have no outposts in the North Atlantic, and by acquiring Bermuda we would have an outpost there which would be of considerable value to us from a defense standpoint.

It might be well for me to mention the fact that 95 percent of all the revenue derived by Bermuda comes out of the port of New York, and equally, 95 percent of all the tourists who visit the island of Bermuda come from the United States. Bermuda, Jamaica, Bimini, and Nassau represent a considerable number of American tourist dollars from year to year, and I do not believe that we would make a bad bargain if we could acquire these possessions at a reasonable figure.

I may add that later this week or early next week I propose to introduce another joint resolution, which will empower and request the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the Republic of France in reference to the acquisition of the islands in the Caribbean, which lie between the Virgin Islands and the Port-of-Spain, not far from the British island possessions in that section of the Caribbean.

In addition I shall include two islands which lie in immediate proximity to Newfoundland. They could be very well used by our airplanes in trans-Atlantic flights when using the northern route.

Mr. President, I should like to have included as a part of my remarks a portion of a letter which I received this morning from a gentleman in New York. I will not give his name, in view of the fact that he did not authorize me to use it publicly. He says:

I was very pleased to see your demand that Bermuda be ceded by the British Empire as part payment of their long-overdue war debt. I believe that the issue of return or surrender by European nations of all their holdings in the western world would be a very popular one with the American people, though it would be bitterly fought by British and French propagandists and their followers here. But surely our neutrality zone is a mockery when we patrol the 300-mile limit to seek German ships, while the war vessels of other belligerents destroy commerce (as they did the other day in the Dutch West Indies) with impunity, ignoring the zone and making use of their bases within.

I should like to have embodied in the RECORD as part of my remarks a press release by the Columbia Press Service, Bond Building, Washington, D. C., without date, in reference to the interest in this matter as evidenced by Representative Sweeney, of Ohio; by Gen. Smedley Butler; by Hon. Smith W. Brookhart, former United States Senator; and a number of others.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Congressman MARTIN L. SWEENEY of Cleveland, Ohio, a Member of the House of Representatives for over 9 years, today announced his acceptance of the post of vice chairman of the "Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee" for the State of Ohio.

In accepting, Congressman SWEENEY voiced his emphatic approval of the committee's aims and of the proposal calling for immediate settlement of European war debts by cession of the British and French West Indies to the United States and the attachment of the deposits of Germany, Italy, and other countries in American banks.

The Ohio Congressman will cooperate energetically, he declared, with Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN of Minnesota, national chairman of the committee, and with such other outstanding leaders as Gen. Smedley D. Butler, vice chairman for Pennsylvania, and former Senator Smith W. Brookhart, vice chairman for Iowa. The list of vice chairmen includes a number of distinguished citizens.

"I am glad to assist in this great work," the Senator asserted, "and I consider the war-debts proposal a very reasonable one. It is high time that the American people, burdened by taxes, poverty, and international disturbances, collect some of the money due them—in real estate where it cannot be collected in cash."

Congressman SWEENEY, as vice chairman for Ohio, plans intensive activity in behalf of the "Make Europe Pay War Debts" movement, and it is likely that he will deliver various addresses as well as radio broadcasts. One such Nation-wide broadcast on the war-debt issue has already been given by Senator LUNDEEN over the National Broadcasting Co. hookup.

"The collection of these war debts or at least a substantial share of them," Congressman SWEENEY commented today, "is highly important both because of the plain undeniable justice of getting back American money or its equivalent, and because the agitation of the topic will be likely to make the American people so sick, tired, and disgusted with foreign wars that no amount of treacherous propaganda will ever draw us into another conflict on alien soil."

Keen gratification was expressed over Congressman SWEENEY's acceptance of the Ohio vice chairmanship of this important national committee by both Senator LUNDEEN and the headquarters of the committee.

"We consider Congressman SWEENEY a most valuable addition to our forces," it was stated, "and we have long had a high respect for his fearless statesmanship and his unwavering stand for genuine American principles. It is upon such men as Mr. SWEENEY that our Nation must depend for its protection against the schemes and stratagems of foreign agents and manipulators."

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should also like to have included in the RECORD a press release by the Columbia Press Service, without date, relative to the matter I have been discussing, in which is described the activities of the Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Formation of the Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee with United States Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, as national chairman, and headquarters in Washington, D. C., was announced today. The list of vice chairmen will include Congressmen, editors, clergymen, educators, scientists, economists, and political leaders.

Senator LUNDEEN, long an advocate of separation of the Americas from involvement in European wars and military intrigues, caused a sensation in Congress when he demanded that the West Indies be seized and applied as payment on account of the European war debts to the United States. The Senator is one of the three remaining Members of Congress who, over 20 years ago, voted against American participation in the first World War. He contends that the entrance of the United States into that conflict was a tragic mistake and that equally strong reasons exist today for keeping out of transoceanic brawls.

The proposal for transfer of the West Indian islands to the ownership of the United States in liquidation of war obligations was favorably received by the American people, as evidenced by the Nation-wide survey made by the American Institute of Public Opinion. The institute's survey showed that 66 percent of those replying to the questionnaire would like to see the war debts exchanged for the islands, while 34 percent were opposed.

Citizens who took part in the institute's straw vote on Senator LUNDEEN's proposal commented that "America will never be paid in any other way," and that the transfer of ownership of various islands in the West Indies and other regions adjacent to the mainland of North and South America would be a practical way of furnishing partial compensation to the United States for the huge sums loaned to European governments in the first World War.

"Every country in Europe, with a few exceptions, owes money to the United States," declared Senator LUNDEEN. "While Great Britain and France are the principal creditors, Germany, Italy, and Russia have their obligations, too. It is not a one-sided proposition. The proposal which I made to Congress is strictly an American demand for a settlement of debts due America from governments on both sides of the present European wrangle. This suggestion has no bearing on the war itself and involves no preference one way or the other."

The Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee, which has headquarters in suite 425–426 of the Bond Building, Washington, D. C., will conduct a series of meetings in principal cities of the United States in an effort to organize sentiment in favor of a demand from the American Government for cash liquidation of war debts or cession of island possessions in the Caribbean Sea and off the coasts of the two American continents as payment on account. Senator LUNDEEN will speak in many of these meetings.

The treasurer and the secretary are Washington newspaper correspondents—Prescott Dennett, executive editor of the Columbia Press Service, being treasurer, and Linn A. E. Gale, free-lance writer and liberal, being secretary. S. Robert Kunkis, with offices in the Paramount Building, New York City, is the committee's attorney.

Four desirable objectives would be attained if European-owned land were ceded to the United States in partial liquidation of the 20-year-old war debts, according to Senator LUNDEEN. They are:

1. Payment of the long-pending obligations which the United States has so far failed to collect.

2. Instilling into the minds of the American people a profound hatred of war, not only because of its cruelties and barbarities, but also because it has left them weighted down with a fearful load of debts and taxes. The demand for payment of European war debts is bound to remind the people of the fact that the United States was "stung" on such an enormous scale in the first World War and would undoubtedly be "stung" still worse if it should be foolish enough to get into another world conflict.

3. Union of the nations of North, Central, and South America in a closer bond of friendship, as the result of the elimination of foreign control from countries south of us and islands in the Caribbean Sea and vicinity, as well as islands off the coasts of the two continents, such as the Falkland Islands near the Argentine coast.

4. The flags of the Americas would fly over all the land from the northern extremity of North America to the southern extremity of South America. America would be insulated against the bloody and devastating conflicts which deluge Europe in gore.

Foreign governments owning no territory in the Western Hemisphere or unwilling to cede their possessions to the United States in adjusting overdue wartime debts could cut down their indebtedness by surrender of bank deposits in this country. Many of these countries have large sums on deposit in American banks. If this money were transferred to the American Treasury, it would materially diminish the totals of the bills due to the United States.

Bermuda, Jamaica, Trinidad, Guadeloupe, Barbados, and hundreds of islands and islets in the Bahamas and other groups would become American territory if Great Britain should turn them over in trying to square up its debt of over two decades ago.

France and other European countries own various islands in or near the Caribbean Sea or a short distance from the coasts of the two American continents.

Senator LUNDEEN points out that European nations still owe the United States approximately $14,500,000,000. Of this sum, Great Britain owes in round figures $5,500,000,000; France, $4,180,000,000; Germany, $1,260,000,000; Belgium, $453,000,000; Czechoslovakia (now possessed by Germany), $166,000,000; Austria (also now a part of Germany), $26,000,000; Poland (now possessed by Germany and Russia), $263,000,000; Italy, $2,000,000,000; Russia, $395,000,000; Hungary, $2,400,000; Greece, $34,000,000; and Finland, $8,230,000. The only country in Europe to meet its obligations to the United States promptly is Finland, whose wartime debt was discounted 50 percent by the American Government. Hungary, it was said, has been paying $18,000 annually, and Greece turned over $13,000 to the United States Treasury on its obligation of $34,000,000.

The next payments on the international debts due to the United States come due December 15 and the State Department will send out to the various European governments the customary formal notices. It is expected that these notices will be ignored as usual, except by Finland, and perhaps the Governments of Greece and Hungary.

Among the Congressmen who have indicated their approval of the aims of the committee in seeking to adjust the war debts from Old World governments are Representatives SCHAFER of Wisconsin; LUDLOW, of Indiana; and MURDOCK of Arizona.

Congressman SCHAFER of Wisconsin declared: "In view of our national debt, which has now passed $41,000,000,000, in addition to many more billions of obligations which Uncle Sam has guaranteed, it is about time that we move to collect the billions of dollars which foreign governments owe us instead of continuing to play Santa Claus to them in a big way."

Dr. John B. Patterson, professor of inter-American affairs at American University and director of its school of public affairs, endorsing the war-debts collection movement, remarked: "Much attention is given the matter of the expropriation of oil properties in Mexico, but little is said about the enormously larger war debts of countries in Europe which have been overdue for a score of years. It is on the latter that we should concentrate, and it is a shame that, with so widespread poverty in this country, the American Government has never made more than casual attempts to collect the huge sums which would do so much toward reducing destitution and restoring prosperity. The United States has not the slightest aspiration to own one inch of European soil, and it is only logical that the entire Western Hemisphere should be owned and controlled by the Americas."

A schedule of mass meetings to be held under the auspices of the Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee in Washington, New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other important cities will be available soon, committee officials said.

Nation-wide approval of the proposal of Senator LUNDEEN is evidenced by correspondence from all parts of the country, committee officials stated.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, insofar as the revenues from these various possessions in the Western Hemisphere of Great Britain are concerned, I requested from the Department of Commerce some statistics on production, foreign trade, and public finance for 1933, 1934, 1935, and for the information of the readers of the RECORD I should like to have this information embodied in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, at a later date I shall endeavor to present a résumé of the revenues, the kinds of government, the square mileage of these possessions, and all other information of a general nature which might be of interest to the American people who are interested in taking over these possessions.

We will want to consider many things in connection with that subject at the time our Government gives consideration to the acquisition of these islands. I have much information before me, but I desire to put it into digested form so that it will not be so difficult for those who desire to pursue the subject.

THE TRAGEDY OF POLAND

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, within the life span of a man he must endure much suffering. Man suffers physically and mentally. From the day a man is born he must struggle for existence. He is beset from all sides by the competition of his fellow men. Economic disturbances take away from him the means of a livelihood. Famine and pestilence come regularly to plague him. The elements are unpredictable and swoop down upon him in unexpected ways. Earthquakes, hurricanes, typhoons, and cloudbursts destroy his home, his land, and his family. Man-made war adds to these disasters. But, Mr. President, all these causes of suffering fade into insignificance when we consider the most devastating of all causes of suffering, namely, man's inhumanity to man. Man has recovered and will continue to recover from these blows. But it is the systematic, premeditated, calculated, and cruel destruction of one body of men by another that makes man's inhumanity to man so terrible. The human mind is capable of administering the most shameful of all inflictions.

Mr. President, the people of Europe have never been well off. The history of Europe is a history of servitude, slavery, starvation, pestilence, plagues, and exploitation of the people. It is a history of terrible and ravaging wars. There never was a plentiful supply of food in Europe. For every potato grown there is a mouth. For every blade of grass there is a lean specimen of livestock. When the elements are not kind and the crops fail, the peasant and his family face starvation.

Mr. President, there is no W. P. A. in Europe!

Somehow the people have managed to survive as a whole. It is amazing what the human body can endure. There are millions in Europe who survive on a piece of bacon and a handful of black bread a day. The most fortunate survive on a cup of potato soup, black bread, and hot water.

But, Mr. President, when war comes to a simple people, their fate is cruel. Armies must be fed, and the countryside must provide it. Lands are laid waste by explosives. Millions starve slowly but surely.

Those who have seen the screen version of Gone With the Wind can appreciate the tremendous and terrible development of instruments of war. Scientific discoveries are two-edged swords; they aid civilization in peace, and destroy civilization in times of war. Every generation provides more and more deadly techniques for taking the lives of millions of men, women, and children who are sacrificed on the altar of "man's inhumanity to man."

Mr. President, the war in Europe is no ordinary war. Outwardly it may appear the same as other wars. We read and hear of the devastation of towns, bombardments of highways and bridges, destruction of industries, confiscation of property and foodstuffs, and executions of human beings. But when we hear and read about the systematic destruction of a whole nation, the complete removal of a nation's people from their homeland, then we have something new and unbelievable. Mr. President, such is the unhappy fate of the Republic of Poland!

For the fourth time in history Poland has been overrun and partitioned. Nevertheless, heretofore she has risen gloriously and regained her rightful place in the world of nations. Her people have heroically cast off the yoke of the oppressors.

As a boy I was acquainted with many families of Polish descent. Some of us played together in the band of Sharon, Pa., and I remember that one of the favorite songs was Poland Shall Never Perish. I was brought up with this firm belief, and during the World War I had an opportunity to visit the new Poland and enjoyed very much my stay in Warsaw.

The events of the last few months have struck horror into the hearts of all of us. The mind is staggered at the thought of the cruel fate which has befallen these brave and noble people. As Americans whose government, acting with the sympathy of the entire Nation, played such an important role in the reconstitution of Polish independence, we cannot but look with dismay upon the present destruction of Poland.

But though Poland was overwhelmed, her people remained on the land, and where men have their feet placed solidly on their own land they will fight valiantly to protect and regain it. Therein lay the secret of the success of the heroic Polish people in rising from the dust into which they had been ground by the cruel heel of the conquerer and the oppressor.

Mr. President, in its struggle for liberty America received the voluntary services of many lovers of liberty from many countries. Those who loved liberty and freedom gave generously of their wealth and services. Those cosmopolitan lovers of liberty, who came from Europe to assist the colonists in their struggles for freedom and independence, are so identified with the founders of our Republic that each deserves a noble monument to his memory.

Not the least of these heroes of the American Revolution were two patriots of Poland. In the annals of the history of the American struggle for independence two names have been etched forever—Thaddeus Kosciuszko, the father of the American artillery, and Count Casimir Pulaski, the father of the American cavalry. Americans will never cease to honor the memory of those Polish patriots. It is only proper and fitting that we should find in all the books which deal with the lives of eminent Americans, a description of the lives of Kosciuszko and Pulaski. They were true Americans. America owes them and the nation that gave them birth an everlasting debt.

What has been said of the American citizenship of Lafayette, Steuben, and De Kalb is true of Kosciuszko and Pulaski. Their deeds naturalized them and we claim them as our own, though they were born in Poland. Kosciuszko became acquainted with Silas Deane, the accredited Paris commissioner of the revolted American colonies, who filled the soul of young Kosciusko with intense zeal to fight for liberty in America and win the honors which Deane promised. He came to America in the summer of 1776 and presented himself to Washington. "What can you do?" asked the Commander in Chief. "Try me," was the laconic reply.

Washington was pleased with the young man, made him his aide, and in October of that year the Continental Congress gave him the appointment of engineer in the Army, with the rank of colonel. He was in the Continental service during the whole war and was engaged in most of the important battles in which Washington in the North, or Greene in the South, commanded the American forces. He was greatly beloved by the American officers and was cordially admitted to membership in the Society of the Cincinnati. At the close of the war he returned to Poland, whose sovereign had permitted him to draw his sword in America, and in 1789 was made a major general by Poniatowski.

In the Polish campaign against Russia in 1792, Kosciuszko greatly distinguished himself; and in the noble attempt of his countrymen, in 1794, to regain their lost liberty, he was chosen general in chief. Soon afterward, at the head of 4,000 men, he defeated 12,000 Russians. Invested with the powers of a military dictator, he boldly defied the combined armies of Russia and Prussia, numbering more than 150,000 men. At length success deserted him; and, in October 1794, his troops were overwhelmed in a battle about 50 miles from Warsaw. He was wounded, fell from his horse, and was made prisoner, exclaiming, "The end of Poland!"

> Hope for a season bade the world farewell,
> And Freedom shrieked as Kosciuszko fell!
> —CAMPBELL.

The hero was cast into prison, in St. Petersburg, by the Empress Catherine. When she died, the Emperor Paul liberated him, and presented him with his own sword. Kosciuszko courteously refused the blade, and then uttered that terrific rebuke for the destroyers of Poland—that noble sentiment of a patriot's heart—"I have no longer need of a sword, since I have no longer a country to defend." He never again wore a military sword.

In the summer of 1797 Kosciuszko visited America, and was received with distinguished honors. Congress awarded him a life pension, and gave him a tract of land, for his services during the Revolutionary War. The following year he went to France, purchased an estate near Fontainebleau, and resided there until 1814. He went to Switzerland, and settled at Soleure, in 1816. Early the following year he abolished serfdom on his family estates in Poland.

On the 16th of October 1817 that noble patriot died at the age of 61 years. His body was buried in the tomb of the ancient kings of Poland at Cracow with great pomp; and at Warsaw there was a public funeral in his honor. The Senate of Cracow decreed that a lofty mound should be erected to his memory on the heights of Bronislawad, and for 3 years men of every class and age toiled in the erection of that magnificent cairn, 300 feet in height. The cadets of the West Point Military Academy erected an imposing monument there to the memory of Kosciuszko in 1829 at a cost of $5,000. His most enduring monument is the record of his deeds on the pages of history.

Count Casimir Pulaski, "The Father of the American Cavalry," came to America with a halo of romance, and was a tower of strength in the field. No general evoked from his troops more heroism than did this noble Pole. Lafayette referred to Pulaski as "one of the most devoted patriots and worthy soldiers in the cause and service of the United States. For this he gloriously laid down his life."

After years of gallant fighting to defend his country from the invasion of the Russians, Prussians, and Austrians, Pulaski went to France in 1775. In the French capital he came in contact with Silas Deane and Benjamin Franklin. He eagerly expressed the desire to enter the American service and fight for human freedom, this time in a strange country and against a new foe.

As Henry Williams said at the laying of the cornerstone of the Savannah monument to Pulaski in 1853:

> It stirred the heart of Pulaski like the voice of a battle trumpet. It was a struggle for liberty. It was his cause, whoever the people and wherever the scene of conflict.

A year passed before arrangements could be perfected. With Lieutenant Colonel Kotkowski, another Polish patriot, he sailed for America in June 1777. Under date of May 29, 1777, Franklin wrote to General Washington, as follows:

> Count Pulaski, of Poland, an officer famous throughout Europe for his bravery and conduct in defense of liberties of his country against the three great invading powers of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, will have the honor of delivering this into Your Excellency's hands. The courts here have encouraged and promoted his voyage from an opinion that he may be highly useful to our service. Mr. Deane has written so fully concerning him that I need not enlarge, and I add my wishes that he may find in our armies under Your Excellency occasions of distinguishing himself.

Thus began a short but brilliant association with George Washington. In less than a month after Pulaski had landed in New England he had presented his letters and had held conferences with Washington at sufficient length to convince the American Commander in Chief that he was one of the foreigners who came with high motives, and whose genuine ability, experience, and character could be used to undoubted advantage. Washington accepted him without reserve.

The one outstanding fact about Pulaski was his eagerness for active service. He proposed to John Hancock, President of the Continental Congress, a plan for developing the Cavalry. Hancock accepted it, and Pulaski set to work to make the Cavalry a potent factor in the Army. On more than one occasion the Cavalry proved the determining factor in the battles with the English. Historian Ramsay says:

> At Brandywine, Pulaski was a thunderbolt of war and always sought the post of danger as the post of honor.

After the Battle of Brandywine, at Warren Tavern, Pulaski saved the Army of Washington from a sudden surprise that might have proved fatal. At the head of his cavalry, while reconnoitering, he came upon a whole army of British near Warren Tavern and harassed the enemy, thus impeding their progress, and hastily gave the information to Washington, who then prepared to meet the enemy.

During the Battle of Savannah, Pulaski, seeing the apparent confusion and realizing that all was not well, drove up at the head of his cavalry to where the French were, to reinforce and encourage them, thinking that he might be able to get to the rear of the enemy through some opening. Dashing madly ahead into a withering flame of shot and shell, he himself was struck in the groin by a swivel shot, and fell from his horse fatally wounded.

Thus ended the life of one who was the incarnation of the best traditions of Polish chivalry. He shared its virtues and its weaknesses. Proud and unyielding, patriotic, and unselfish he formed a worthy member of the gallant band of men who came to help America in the Revolution; and none deserves a higher rank in the minds and hearts of the American people. He fought and died for liberty, and maintained a firm sense of his personal dignity and obligations, and a fearless advocacy of his code to all lands and all epochs.

In his own words Pulaski had said:

Honor and a true desire of distinguishing myself in defense of liberty was the only motive which fired my breast for the cause of the United States.

He wrote to Congress:

I am a republican whom the love of glory and the honor of supporting the liberty of the Union drew hither.

At the young age of 38 Pulaski died as he had lived, a noble and undaunted warrior, fighting the battles of liberty and of the Republic. He sacrificed himself, all the years of his young life, his fortune, his ancestral dignity, his lofty spirit, his splendid genius, and all his earthly hopes, for liberty, justice, and humanity. For these things he gave all he had—his martyred life.

America has not been unmindful of its debt to Pulaski. Washington, D. C., and Savannah, Ga., have erected monuments to his memory. The Pulaski Skyway connecting New Jersey and New York City is a tribute of gratitude. Within only a few miles of my home town of Sharon, Pa., is a town bearing the name Pulaski, Pa. These are but a few of the material contributions dedicated to the everlasting memory of Pulaski.

Mr. President, the story of Polish contributions to American and world history and culture is long and glorious. It is sad indeed to watch a nation which produced Kosciusczko, Pulaski, Pilsudski, Paderewski, Rubenstein, Chopin, Mme. Curie, and others, go down into oblivion. Time does not permit me to outline their contributions. They are well known. All have contributed materially to music, science, military tactics, technology, and the many arts. Their heritage is rich, and we have been the fortunate recipients.

But, Mr. President, what is actually happening today in the land which gave America the services of these men? No one seems to know exactly, for the Nazi conqueror and the Soviet invaders have done their job of crushing a people so completely that they dare not let the world know of their craft. Oh, yes, Mr. President, Nazi efficiency is systematically and methodically driving out of Poland her people. Nazi efficiency is slowly starving the people of Poland so that Nazi soldiers might live. Yes, Nazi ruthlessness is eradicating a people from the face of the earth. Poland has become a nation of vagabonds.

A publication entitled "Warschauer Zeitung," the official organ of the military government of Germany in Hitler's half of Poland, announces that:

The mistakes of the German, Russian, and Austro-Hungarian empires, which left the Polish hopes alive for more than a century and finally led to the resurrection of the Polish state, are not to be repeated.

A project outlined on July 5, 1918, by Paul von Hindenburg to crush Polish aims for nationality and expropriate Polish property has been revived and damnably improved upon. At that time Hindenburg said:

It is necessary once and for all to remove all bases for Polish ambitions and make them dependent on the support of the German Empire.

Some 19,000,000 people were living in the 100,000 square miles of Poland Hitler now claims for his own. Of these, about 900,000 were of Germanic strain. There were about 2,000,000 Jews. The rest were Poles.

Now Hitler is calling home from Latvia, Estonia, Russia, Rumania, and Hungary all those whom he defines as Germans, even unto the seventh generation. They are coming back to take over the 100,000 square miles of Poland that Hitler has annexed to the Reich. Some 7,000,000 Poles and 1,000,000 Jews are going to be pushed out of the richest parts of the western provinces to make room for them.

A wedge of Poland to the south center, lying between Warsaw and the Slovak border, consisting of roughly 58,000 square miles of already overtaxed land in the provinces of Warsaw, Kielce, Lublin, and Cracow, will have added to its present population of 11,000,000 the 8,000,000 dispossessed.

How these 19,000,000 people are to live is not explained in the miserable Warschauer Zeitung. But there can be only one answer: Somebody is going to starve and leave this earth an emaciated, horrible body. We can be sure that those affected will not be those who came in from other countries to take over the land.

About 50 percent of the homes of Poland were destroyed when the Nazis stabbed through to Lwow in September. There never was adequate housing, even in peace; and the land has always had more than enough weight of people on it. Even without the new millions, many of those who have always lived there would have starved this winter, because the war ruined the harvest; and when there is no harvest people die in that part of the world. There is no W. P. A. in Poland! Nor is Hitler likely, with the blockade bearing down upon the Germans, to hesitate much before expropriating whatever food the Poles accumulate from any source.

I am informed that in Nazi-occupied Poland some 19,000,000 Poles, including about 2,000,000 Jews, are now exposed to death by executions, starvation, or disease. Although Germany and Russia have drawn screens about their activities in Poland, enough has leaked out through neutrals, and the few who have escaped from that area, to reveal a dismal picture.

Polish spokesmen here are convinced that the German resettlement scheme is nothing more than "a systematic program for extermination of the Polish people." One of the tragedies of this forced mass migration is that even the Germans whom the Nazis are uprooting and moving into Poland are, for the most part, bitterly opposed to the project. Most of them have lived where they are now living for generations—longer than most Americans of German origin have lived in this country.

Mr. President, the people of Poland need the assistance of the world, and especially of the United States, if they are to survive. It is not a question of providing munitions of war. The people of Poland need munitions of life. It is true that there are millions within our own country who could use more aid from the Government and from citizens through private initiative. I always have been and always will be for adequate aid to our needy. But it would be selfish to close our eyes to the slow, miserable death of our brethren in other countries. That has never been the policy of this Nation. We extended aid to Belgium during the World War and to all other European countries after the war. American charity over a long period fed 1,500,000 German children daily. Robert Burns put it aptly when he said, "A man's a man for a' that and a' that!" The love man has for his fellows in distress must transgress the physical limitations of geography.

The American Red Cross and the Commission for Polish Relief have responded nobly to the aid of Poland. But they have met many difficulties. For 4 months neither has been permitted access to German-occupied Poland. Access has been granted in the city of Cracow only. It has been only in the last few days that the Nazi Government has granted limited access into Nazi-occupied Poland. Why should messengers of mercy be denied the privilege of administering aid to the destitute and starving? Mr. President, there must be a sinister motive. Is it not possible that conditions are so terrible that the Nazi government does not dare to reveal them to the outside world?

Both relief organizations are rightfully demanding that the distribution of supplies be administered by their representatives; and until the principle of American supervision is accepted by the German Government, the British and Allied Governments have informed both agencies that they will not permit one pound of supplies to go through the blockade to Poland. It remains to be seen how and to what extent the Nazi Government will honor its limited permission to the American Red Cross and the Commission for Polish Relief to administer their own relief.

It is no longer a secret to the world that tremendous changes have taken place in Poland during the past 4 months. It is known that over one-third of the city of Warsaw was destroyed; that its 1,200,000 inhabitants are struggling to survive under most difficult food conditions; that this is the most bitter winter which Poland and all Europe have had in 50 years; that the transport of food and fuel is extremely difficult, following the disorganization of war; that millions of people, on account of economic dislocation, are without employment in Poland; that they do not have the means of paying for food, shelter, and fuel; that the hundreds of thousands of people receiving soup in various citizens' relief kitchens throughout the country represent only a fraction of those in need; that the financial means of carrying on this local relief for even a fraction of the needy are nearly exhausted, and that hundreds of thousands of the population of former Poland are being moved from one territory to another, in the process of which they lose all basis for sustenance and existence.

The relief program which is envisaged for the stricken population of Poland foresees the furnishing of supplies on a scale of $2,000,000 per month, such action to be supported jointly by private charity and the grants of governments. Every week which passes means the loss of thousands of lives because of cold and hunger. The American Red Cross advises that the principal needs are for medicines, surgical instruments and hospital equipment, and also for warm clothing, blankets, bedding, and shoes.

Mr. President, private contributions have been the only source of aid to Poland. As of February 17, the American Red Cross' expenditures and commitments for Polish relief amounted to more than $397,000. This expenditure has been for relief in Poland and in Rumania, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Lithuania, and Latvia where Polish refugees have been receiving assistance following the German occupation of Poland. The American Red Cross has also shipped clothing and hospital supplies produced by volunteers working in Red Cross chapters valued at more than $26,000. This estimated value represents only the cost of materials used in the production of these supplies and does not include any money value placed on the labor of thousands of volunteers engaged in this effort.

For the same purposes the Commission for Polish Relief is administering private contributions amounting to more than $125,000.

Mr. President, the most inspiring spectacle I have seen in this country has been the manner in which the American people have responded to the aid of their distressed fellowmen. Nowhere in the world is there such a noble response. Our people play no favorites. Regardless of color, nationality, creed, or government, those who are in vital need receive our aid. Our reward will be received on that far and green shore of the Great Beyond. There must be a reward far more beautiful than that which this world can provide. The men of government and the men of production must come together to provide the necessary relief.

EXTENSION OF ANTIPERNICIOUS POLITICAL ACTIVITIES ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3046) to extend to certain officers and employees in the several States and the District of Columbia the provisions of the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious political activities," approved August 2, 1939.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in order to clear up the parliamentary situation, let me say that I understand there is no objection to making Senate bill 3046 the unfinished business. So at this time I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 3046 be made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 3046) to extend to certain officers and employees in the several States and the District of Columbia the provisions of the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious political activities," approved August 2, 1939, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with amendments.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee amendments will be considered first.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Mexico if he wishes to go on with the bill this afternoon?

Mr. HATCH. I should much prefer not to go on this afternoon but to wait until tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is agreeable to me now to move an adjournment or recess until tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was only going to observe that the request for the consideration of committee amendments first is not quite in order for a legislative bill. I am not going to urge that point, but there should be an explanation made of the bill before it reaches the stage of amendment. I think it is quite proper that the Senate should now adjourn for the day, but at this time I want to say to the Senator from New Mexico that tomorrow I hope, when the Senate convenes at 12 o'clock, he will make an explanation of the provisions of his bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will say that it is my intention on tomorrow when the Senate convenes to request that the bill be considered section by section and to explain just what it does and in what manner we have approached the problem.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I intend to propose to Senate bill 3046 and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for Senate bill 3046 and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

REIMBURSEMENT OF STATES FOR LOSS BY FEDERAL LAND OWNERSHIP

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, Members of this body and of the other House have on numerous occasions in the past expressed a great deal of interest in the problem of the reimbursement to the States for tax revenue lost by reason of the Federal ownership of land. During many years the Congress has considered this problem and numerous acts have been passed, as, for example, when the national forests were created it was provided that a portion of the revenues from the national forests should be paid to the States in lieu of taxation upon the lands. Likewise, when the Congress passed the General Leasing Act, affecting mineral lands, oil and gas lands, upon the public domain, a provision was written into the law that a certain proportionate share of the royalties derived therefrom should be paid to the States in which the leased deposits existed.

This morning the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and I introduced a bill to provide, for example, that a collection which the Government of the United States is about to make by reason of a lawsuit affecting the Elk Hills naval reserve in California shall go to the reclamation fund.

During the past session several bills were introduced, some in the Senate and some in the House of Representatives, designed to provide a standard method of substitute payment to States. These measures, I understand, are now under consideration by the Federal Real Estate Board, from which a report may be expected. The Federal Real Estate Board was created by the President for the purpose of coordinating the methods of handling lands now under the direction of different administrative agencies.

Today I have a letter from the Chief of the Soil Conservation Service dealing with the distribution of payments to the States in lieu of taxation under title III of the Bankhead-Jones Act. It is a matter of such importance, Mr. President, that I ask unanimous consent that, as a part of my remarks in the body of the RECORD, there may be printed a letter from Dr. Bennett to myself, together with a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture to the Secretary of the Treasury, and a table showing the distribution of the payment of 25 percent of the receipts under the farm-tenant provisions of the Bankhead-Jones Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1940.

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: In accordance with your verbal request of March 1, the following information is furnished concerning the payment to counties under title III of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act:

In determining the payments to counties, the net revenue for each project is arrived at by defining net revenue as the gross receipts incident to the use of the land, reduced only by the applicable refunds or adjustments, which is in accordance with the Comptroller General's decision. The 25 percent of net revenue payable to counties, as provided in section 33 of title III of the above-named act, is distributed to the counties within which the project is located on the basis of the acreage held under title III within each county as of the end of the year.

We are enclosing a copy of the statement showing the recommended distribution of returns to counties and a copy of the letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture to the Secretary of the Treasury recommending the distribution of payments to counties under this program for the calendar year 1938. It will be noted that the total recommended payments to counties was $11,513.46 on an acreage of 4,937,481, which is equivalent to 2.33 mills per acre. The distribution of the payments to counties for the calendar year 1939 will total approximately $30,000 on an approximate acreage of 5,800,000, which is equivalent to 5.2 mills per acre. It is currently estimated that the return to counties for 1940 in total will approximate $38,500 on 7,000,000 acres, which is equivalent to 5.5 mills per acre.

We are advised by the General Accounting Office that the certificates of settlement for the 1938 payments in excess of $1 have been sent to the Treasury Department for actual issuance of checks so that the payments to the counties should actually be made in a very short time. The Service will be recommending the payments to counties for the calendar year 1939 very soon.

Sincerely,

H. H. BENNETT, Chief.

NOVEMBER 14, 1939.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In accordance with the procedure prescribed by the General Accounting Office for carrying out the provisions of section 33 of title III of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act (Public, No. 210, 75th Cong., approved July 22, 1937), which requires that 25 percent of the net revenues received each calendar year from the use of land held by the Secretary of Agriculture under this title of the act will be paid to the counties in which any land is so held, there is submitted, in duplicate, a statement showing the recommended distribution, by counties, of 25 percent of the net receipts for the calendar year 1938. The recommended distribution of the 25 percent of net receipts to counties, as shown on the attached statement, has been determined on the basis of the acreage of each county in each project.

It is recommended that the distribution of 25 percent of the net receipts for the calendar year 1938, which, after reconciliation, amount to $11,513.46, be made to counties as provided in the attached statement and in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the General Accounting Office in letters to the Secretary of Agriculture dated December 7, 1937, and July 7, 1939.

In this connection, it is requested that a transfer and counter-warrant be issued transferring the sum of $46,053.90 as follows:

DEBIT

126026 Receipts from submarginal-land program, Farm Tenant Act $46,053.90

CREDIT

126204 Receipts due counties from submarginal-land program, Farm Tenant Act (name of State and county) (special fund, 25 percent) 11,513.46

125476 Proceeds from submarginal-land program, Farm Tenant Act (75 percent) 34,540.44

Sincerely,

HARRY L. BROWN, Acting Secretary.

DESTITUTION AND UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have just had a private conversation with my good friend the senior Senator from the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] in reference to the remarks he made in the Senate this afternoon regarding the Poles. I think it is highly commendable of the Senator from Pennsylvania to speak of the distress in foreign lands, and I commend his action to every American citizen who speaks out in behalf of the poor, the unfortunate, the undernourished in all parts of the world.

That reminds me that only a few days ago I observed through the columns of the press that Mr. Hoover—who was succeeded by President Roosevelt—had appeared at the Capitol, before a committee, at which time he made a request for $20,000,000 in the form of an appropriation from the publics moneys of the United States, from our Treasury for the purpose of feeding the unfortunates abroad now and those who will be found there after the end of the present war. I commend Mr. Hoover. I served a short term under Mr. Hoover. As a matter of fact, I served during the last "Lame Duck" Congress, at which time Mr. Hoover was President, and at which time Mr. Curtis, of Kansas, was our very able Vice President.

The article to which I refer reads:

CONGRESS ASKED BY HOOVER TO HELP FEED POLES—CITES FAMINE PERIL AT HOUSE HEARINGS

(By Carl Warren)

Herbert Hoover, once more in the role of the "great humanitarian"—a part which served as his springboard to the White House in 1928—seized the spotlight yesterday as unofficial sponsor of American relief for war victims in Poland as well as Finlend.

Asserting "the whole of Europe will be a starvation spot" after the war, Hoover urged Congress to start a food-shipment program by immediately appropriating $10,000,000 to $20,000,000.

For 45 minutes the somber-voiced, slow-spoken ex-President who heads his own Finnish relief orgnization, testified at a jam-packed hearing of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Seven million Poles, he said, face destitution this spring. He conferred with Polish and Finnish diplomats before returning to New York City at 4 p. m.

Mr. President, I think it is highly commendable and most laudable for the ex-President of the United States to be interesting himself in feeding the poor and looking after the destitute abroad; but I say that our first duty is to help the unfortunates of the United States of America. When I read that article in the newspaper I turned page after page, and what did I find in the same issue? Let us see about some of the destitute in this country. I think the time has come when we ought to think, at least a little bit, about the unfortunates in this country of ours.

Not so long ago the First Lady of the Land made a surprise visit to one of the public institutions of the District of Columbia, designed for the care of the aged and the infirm, at what is known as Blue Plains; and she remarked at the time that conditions at the institution were an outrage against decency. As a matter of fact, an investigation followed; and what did I find in the same newspaper from which I clipped this article?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly; I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Only this morning I received a letter from a widow in my State, an excellent lady, whom I have known for years, in which she called my attention to the fact that she had seen the article the Senator referred to. She stated that she has tried hard to get work from the N. Y. A. and other agencies. She has three children, but she cannot get work; and she asked me what Congress is going to do about feeding people in the United States before we take any action toward feeding people in Europe.

Let me add that within striking distance of this very room in the city of Washington, the Capital of the most potent and rich nation in the world, there is a schoolhouse at Massachusetts Avenue and First Street. Any Senator who will go there on any Thursday will find ladies from all over the city of Washington, mending and repairing old clothes, not for the lowly Negroes but for the white children of the city of Washington; and still we talk about being sorry for the people elsewhere.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator very much for his contribution.

Mr. President, in that connection, as I was about to relate, in the same issue of the newspaper I found the following:

UNEMPLOYMENT RISES 1,000,000 IN MONTH

Curtailed industrial activity and trade brought a sharp increase in unemployment and relief during January, Work Projects Commissioner F. C. Harrington said today.

Unemployment rose 1,000,000 over December as a result of seasonal influences, decreased agricultural employment, and a general slump in industrial activity. Mr. Harrington emphasized that the total unemployment approximated the level reached last summer. He did not give total unemployment figures because of divergent estimates.

Although W. P. A. rolls were expanded to absorb approximately 113,000 unemployed men and women, Mr. Harrington said, total W. P. A. enrollees at the end of the month numbered 700,000 less than a year ago. Enrollment totaled 2,265,000 on January 31, an increase of 500,000 since September.

"The effect of this decline in employment is to wipe out practically all the gains which have been made since August," Mr. Harrington said. "This has thrown an increasingly heavy burden on local relief agencies at a time when they are struggling with the problems created by the almost unprecedented cold weather.

Mr. President, of course, it is pathetic to think about the people in Europe who have been placed in an unfortunate position as a result of the fighting that is going on there; but let me show what else I clipped from the same newspaper:

CHILD OF POVERTY DEAD IN MYSTERY—MOTHER OF VICTIM, 11, WAS DENIED RELIEF

KANSAS CITY, KANS., March 1.—Police early today abandoned a theory that 11-year-old Harry Larsen hanged himself and announced: "It definitely looks like murder."

Detectives Holly Parker and Patrick J. Mallory began requestioning members of the family after police earlier said they believed the boy had taken his own life because "I am tired of eating mush, and that was about all we had."

Harry was found strangled to death in his bedroom by a school friend. A knotted undershirt tied to his neck was attached to a door knob.

Palmer and Mallory said they had found "new evidence" that caused them to drop the theory that the son of widowed Mrs. Agnes Larsen, mother of seven children, had committed suicide.

The detectives said they had learned that Harry, next to the youngest, had "had some trouble with other members of the family," but they refused to elaborate.

Police said neighbors who were questioned told them that only the eldest child was working "for about five or six dollars a week." They said they had heard Harry say, "I'd about as soon be dead as eat mush all the time."

Mrs. Larsen had been unable to get relief because her oldest child, Orville, had a hotel job. The dead boy was next to the youngest in the family of four boys and three girls.

In a different newspaper, the Washington Daily News, I find an article headed as follows:

"Okies" at our door—Misery and squalor of migratory workers along eastern seaboard matches Grapes of Wrath, says F. S. A. report.

This article describes the misery in which thousands upon thousands of American citizens, men and women and their offspring, are living along the highways and the byways today, some in tents, some without any covering, some occupying old, deserted, dilapidated houses, anything to serve as a roof over their heads. The article goes on to speak about the thousands upon thousands who are going not only to California, but to Georgia and South Carolina and Florida, and states that they are without food, without clothing, and many of them are so greatly undernourished that they are about on the verge of starvation.

I ask unanimous consent to have the article to which I refer printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Harvest season in the East will bring scenes like these [referring to photographs] close to the Nation's Capital.

The wretched conditions of the California-bound "Okies," which John Steinbeck described in Grapes of Wrath, are not worse than the poverty, squalor, and disease of the migratory workers in the East, according to the Farm Security Administration.

The apple orchards of the Shenandoah and the truck farms of the Eastern Shore will draw them north in creaking jalopies, in freight cars, and old trucks. They will live in ditch-side camps without sanitary facilities. They will work 12 to 18 hours a day. And when their work is done they will move on to the next crop.

From Florida to New Jersey between 10,000 and 20,000 families engage in rush period farm labor, the F. S. A. estimates. Soon they will finish harvesting winter vegetables in Florida. Then they will chop cotton and pick peaches in Georgia, work the strawberry, tobacco, and vegetable areas in the Carolinas. Then northward again to meet the apple-picking season in the Shenandoah and on to the truck farms of Maryland and Delaware, and finally on to pick cranberries in the New Jersey bogs.

Most of the migrants are Negroes. All are native-born. Some are northern workers who can't find factory jobs. More than 50 percent are syphilitic. Common-law marriages of a "seasonal nature" are common. Few children attend school.

"Education is in competition with beans in this county," the superintendent of schools in Palm Beach County, Fla., was quoted as saying, "and beans are winning out."

The report particularly cites the squalor and the moral license in Belle Glade and Pahokee, Fla. "The number of girls and young women from 16 to 25 who are alone in the district so far as family ties are concerned is alarming," the report cited. "Daughters of small Georgia, Arkansas, and Alabama sharecroppers are numerous.

"The exploitation of children brought down from Georgia by persons posing as the children's parents is not uncommon."

Workers subsist on cold and ready-prepared foods such as bread, crackers, cheese, baked beans, sliced sausage, salt fish, and the like, washed down with soda pop.

"Whisky bottles are encountered far more frequently than milk bottles in the vicinity of the quarters," the report said.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I think the time has come when we should devote at least a few of our charitable thoughts to the United States and to people here at home. We hear of innumerable agencies to help the Finns, and to help the Poles, and to help the Spaniards, and to help the Chinese, and to help the Czechoslovaks, and to help the Germans, and to help the Rumanians, and to help the people of this nation and that nation. Their misery is described, and we hear daily about their unfortunate condition. I am glad we have in this country persons who are looking after the people over there; but what I am interested in is finding in this country somebody who is going to look after starving, undernourished, poorly clad people in the United States of America.

In conclusion, let me say that in reading a newspaper a moment ago, the Washington Daily News, I saw this article:

JOBLESS AID REQUESTS REACH OVER 800,000

More than 800,000 people were forced to seek unemployment compensation checks in January because the drop in industrial activity deprived them of their jobs, the Social Security Board reported today.

Nearly $41,000,000 was paid out in benefit payments, a rise of more than 34 percent over the previous month. Reports covering more than 6,000,000 weeks of unemployment were filed with unemployment compensation offices throughout the country, the Board said.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely want to say that I imagine, from what the Senator has said, that he believes in the old-fashioned doctrine that "charity begins at home."

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes, sir; I thank the Senator very much. I believe that charity begins at home.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Thomas Glynn Walker, of New Jersey, to be United States district judge for the district of New Jersey.

POSTMASTERS—NOMINATIONS RECOMMITTED

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that that nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order is made.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not see the Senator from California present; but I will explain to him tomorrow why that is done, and he will have every opportunity to look after the nomination.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I desire to say that on February 29 the Senate confirmed the nomination of Fred A. Sommars to be postmaster at Carrington, N. Dak. I ask that the vote whereby the nomination was confirmed be reconsidered, and that the nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the nomination of Fred A. Sommars to be postmaster at Carrington, N. Dak., was confirmed is reconsidered, and the nomination is recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

This concludes the Executive Calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 4, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our gracious Father in Heaven, we pray that the words of the Apostle, "Thy will be done" may put exultation in our minds and hearts; let us delight to do Thy will. Lift us out of any selfishness into an absorbing dignity and responsibility that our labors may be threaded with a great and exalted purpose. Baptize us with Thy grace like the sunlight behind the flower until we walk in Thy ways, thinking Thy thoughts, and making the weak strong and the strong just. O let Thy will be done within the four walls of our own country; grant that this prayer may liberate all stricken ones that are chained to the prison house of poverty, sin, and despair. O Thou Christ of the lonely way, Thou Rose of Sharon, forever bloom in our own hearts. We would keep silence before Thee. The presence of a chivalrous and brave soldier is with us. In this Chamber he labored faithfully and at the last paid the full measure of sacrifice. O Thou who telleth the tale of unspeaking death lift the curtain of that which is to come. In our dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 1, 1940, was read and approved.

Mr. Speaker, my minute is just about gone and I am afraid the gavel will fall before I get a chance to say a word, but read in the RECORD tomorrow what I have to say about this administration and the promises it has made and the performance it has accomplished, and you will find that instead of President Roosevelt thinking now that he ought to continue for a third term he will resign today and let somebody else take his place, because he has not carried out those promises. [Applause.]

SEVEN LONG YEARS OF NEW DEAL

Today is the seventh anniversary of the reign of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Previous to his assuming office he made some of the finest campaign pledges for the operation of this Government that any President has ever made, and for 6 months after taking office he started in to carry out his promises for economy, efficiency, stability, and liberty. And I give you this one quotation—besides, the Democratic platform of 1932 could not have been more sound. The quotation is as follows, delivered at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932:

> The credit of the family depends chiefly upon whether that family is living within its income. And that is equally true of the Nation. If the Nation is living within its income, its credit is good.
> If government lives beyond its income for a year or two, it can usually borrow temporarily at reasonable rates. But if, like a spendthrift, it throws discretion to the winds and is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending; if it extends its taxing to the limit of the people's power to pay and continues to pile up deficits, then it is on the road to bankruptcy.

What happened in 6 months, when they started on a program of spend, spend, spend, and lend, lend, lend; of destruction, killing the pigs, plowing under the cotton and burning the wheat; of waste and extravagance, such as our country never dreamed of previous to that time? Then the President, with his spend, spend, spend program requested the Congress to give him power and give him money. This they did. Money meant nothing to the New Deal Congress, and they gave him, at the first crack out of the box, $4,880,000,000—the worst thing that Congress ever did to any President at his own request. That was only the start to wanting. They have continued to give until they have put in his hands in the past 7 years over $18,000,000,000 in the guise of relief, and what have we to show for it? Much nothing—a lot of buildings and improvements and so-called improvements that will continue to increase the daily cost of government. But we still have the debt for our children and our children's children to pay. The same story of the rich man leaving the son a lot of money without any experience in handling it. And what has been your experience in the majority of cases of this kind? Waste and extravagance and, finally, a wreck.

Where do we find ourselves today, as a nation with a debt limit of $45,000,000,000 and now up to the debt limit? Will this administration get through this year or will they have to increase it? I think they are going to try to get through this year and leave the next administration to increase it in order that they do not disobey the law. But this administration surely will disobey the law because their bookkeeping will be so juggled to avert the knowledge of the people from knowing what the maximum debt really is.

Seven long years of extravagance. Ten million men out of work when they came into office. Ten million men out of work today. After 7 years of trying to find jobs it seems to me with the same number of unemployed, the story is inability to meet the situation. In 7 long years, each year with a great deficit from one billion and a half dollars up, until we have created the greatest and most consistent deficit the world has ever known by any government. We were promised before the 7 years began that we would eliminate bureaus and consolidate departments. This was for economy in government. Instead we have set up more bureaus. Last year we started in to consolidate offices, and since the consolidation we have added to the Government pay roll over 100,000 additional employees. Putting employees on the Government pay roll for the taxpayers to pay will not decrease our national deficit, but will tend to increase it. Where is the economy?

In 7 years we have given the President more power in 100 laws that have been passed than any President has ever had; in fact, than any President ever would want. It is too much power for a bad man, and a good man would not have asked for it. We have placed in the hands of the President of the United States now, should he declare an emergency, power to take over the radio stations; take over the telegraph and telephone communications; take over the railroads, air lines, bus and truck lines; take over industrial establishments if they refuse preference to Government contracts. In 7 long years we have given the President the power to restrict production on the farm, to fix prices on agricultural products, and to manufacture goods in competition with private enterprise. In 7 long years we have given the President the power to create business corporations, and we now have our Government owning and controlling more business than was ever known in the history of our Nation. The President had the power to confiscate all the gold, which he did, and buried it in Kentucky. He decreased the value of the dollar to 59 cents. He is now hoarding the silver and burying it at West Point.

In 7 years we have given the President the power, in case he wants to use it, to close the banks and stock exchanges for 90 days. Dictatorship is close at hand. Will we permit it to go on?

Today, Mr. President, is the seventh year of your reign. Much talk is buzzing over the country as to whether you are contemplating running for another term. After the failure that you have had during the past 7 years in trying to solve the problem of unemployment and put this country on a solid foundation, I should advise you not to run for a third term but to resign your office now and let somebody else fill the remaining year. I say this not in the spirit of contempt, not in the spirit of enmity or jealousy, but I say it for the good of America, American agriculture, American labor, American industry, and American liberty.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include some excerpts and a recent resolution and telegrams of historical value on the memorial bodies at Fort Wayne, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to read a short resolution recently adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Clerk may read a resolution referred to by him, adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is it about? I do not think we ought to start a campaign of political propaganda in that way, and I believe I will object for the time being.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, everybody agreed to an unusual thing last week, and that was upon the assembling of the House today, and before calling the Consent Calendar, 1 hour of memorial exercises would be conducted. I think we ought to proceed with it. Therefore, I shall object to anyone proceeding for any length of time at the present time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. FITZPATRICK, from the Committee on Appropriations, for Mr. TAYLOR, reported the bill (H. R. 8745, Report No. 1709) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and referred to the Union Calendar.

Mr. RICH reserved all points of order against the bill.

THE LATE HONORABLE ROYAL C. JOHNSON

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House 1 hour has been set aside for the purpose of paying tribute to the memory of the late ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] for 1 hour.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York to be yielded as he sees fit.

I now yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that we, the former service men, soldiers of the World War, should devote a short time today as a memorial to ROYAL C. JOHNSON, former Congressman and our former comrade.

ROYAL JOHNSON was beloved and admired by all who knew him. He was born in 1882, admitted to the bar in South Dakota, his home, in 1906, and practiced law in Highmore, S. Dak. He was deputy State's attorney in 1909 and 1910, attorney General of South Dakota, 1911 to 1915, inclusive, and was a Member of the Sixty-fourth to Seventy-second Congresses, inclusive. During the war on January 5, 1918, he resigned from Congress and enlisted as a private in the United States Army. He was promoted to sergeant, Company K, Three Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry, April 23, 1918; to second lieutenant June 1, 1918, and assigned to Company D, Three Hundredth and Thirteenth Infantry. He was then promoted to first lieutenant September 3, 1918. He, with his company and regiment, went overseas on July 6, 1918. He was wounded on September 27, 1918, in the fierce fighting at Montfaucon, and discharged from the service on December 20, 1918. He was awarded and received the Distinguished Service Cross, the Purple Heart, and the French Croix de Guerre.

Since the war he was always active in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the veterans. He was a member of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans. It is not inappropriate for me to say that the veterans, those who were disabled as well as those who are in perfect health, are under a deep debt of gratitude for the part he has played in their behalf.

I first knew him when I came to the Sixty-seventh Congress on March 4, 1921. He, together with those of us who were former service men, was responsible for the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation which was organized during the first session of the Sixty-eighth Congress on the 18th day of January 1924. I served on this committee with him the greater part of the time as the ranking minority member until March 3, 1929. I think every Member who has served on his committee admired him because of his absolute honesty, his fairness, and his high character. He was absolutely fearless. At no time on the committee would he allow partisanship to enter into the proceedings of the committee. As an illustration, he assigned two Democrats on the subcommittee, Milligan and myself, to draft the veteran legislation of 1924. At another time I was chairman of the subcommittee to investigate the Government hospitals. During the entire time that I served on the committee, I was his close friend.

After he retired from Congress he practiced law here in the District of Columbia and had a lucrative practice. He was in short, every inch a gentleman, a good lawyer, a fine soldier, and an outstanding citizen, and I, together, with his multitude of friends regret his untimely passing last year. Today it honors us to pay tribute to the memory of ROYAL C. JOHNSON, our former comrade in arms, our former colleague in Congress, who bore on his body the wounds received in battle, and who, whether in peace or in war, gave his best to the Nation that he loved so well.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. NELSON). The gentleman from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this is an unusual tribute to an unusual former Member of this House, ROYAL JOHNSON, who has gone to join his comrades and those disabled veterans whom he aided in the bivouac of the dead. It is fitting and right that the House of Representatives should pause in its deliberations and pay this unusual tribute to one of its foremost former Members who died in the prime of life on August 1 last year, leaving a devoted wife and two sons.

"For Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime" and probably as the result of the wounds he received in battle and the shock to his heart.

ROYAL JOHNSON was a gallant soldier, a distinguished and able legislator, a congenial and loyal friend, and a patriotic American in time of peace as well as war. He was the youngest attorney general ever to be elected in the State of South Dakota. He was elected to the Congress of the United States when he was 33 years of age. Shortly afterward he refused to be stampeded into voting for a declaration of war and was one of the 51 Members of the House who voted against our entry into the war with Germany. That vote took political courage and showed that he had the courage of his convictions. After war was declared he volunteered and entered the Army as a buck private. He was promoted successively to the grades of second lieutenant and first lieutenant in the Seventy-ninth Division. He led his men into action in the famous and hard-fought battle of Montfaucon, where he was badly wounded. He was decorated for gallantry by both the American and French Governments. He was in the hospital in France when he was reelected to Congress in 1918 by his constituents.

On his return to the Congress he introduced and secured the passage of a bill granting a national charter to the American Legion. He introduced and secured the passage of a bill awarding the Medal of Honor and the Distinguished Service Cross to the Unknown Soldier. When the Veterans' Committee was created in 1924 he became its first chairman and inaugurated with the other members of the committee our Government's policy of compensation and hospitalization for our disabled American soldiers. Today those hospitals, some 80 in number, stand as monuments to the honor and memory of ROYAL JOHNSON.

I think it is well as we pause in our deliberations today to repeat some of the words that ROYAL JOHNSON himself used back in 1917, when the House was considering the draft bill for which he voted, because today we are in the midst of war hysteria and fear and dread of being involved in another foreign war. Surely those in our midst who would have us go abroad again to fight to make the world safe for democracy and want to send the youth of America to foreign lands to fight other people's battles, and those internationalists and interventionists who are now clamoring to police and quarantine the world, should carefully weigh the remarks that ROYAL JOHNSON made in a speech on the floor of this House on April 26, 1917, directed at the war mongers of those days:

> Unlike Theodore Roosevelt, they never did and do not want to fight. They want to resolve, and I hereby christen them "resolution patriots," and define such patriots as "men who are long on resolving and short on enlisting." * * *
> I have been very much interested in the method of selection under the conscription law. If I had that duty, I want to assure you there would be a nonpartisan, nonpolitical choice, but that I would select a lot of "resolution patriots." * * * After selecting them, I would like to have the privilege of picking out the place for them to fight, and I assure you they would get all the fighting they have been so vociferously clamoring for—and they would do a lot more fighting and a lot less resolving.

Mr. Speaker, ROYAL JOHNSON was a credit to South Dakota. He was a credit to the party to which he belonged. He was a credit to the House of Representatives as one of its most distinguished Members for some 18 years; and, above all, he was a credit to America because of his vigorous Americanism and because he was a true patriot in time of peace as well as in war.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT].

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I knew the honorable and distinguished late ROYAL JOHNSON; I knew him very well. He was a capable lawyer, a gallant soldier, and a distinguished legislator. As has been said, this is an unusual ceremony for an unusual man, but in every way he is entitled to this honor.

It was my privilege to serve with him. He gave unstinted service and a helping hand to everyone, regardless of political affiliation. He was concerned always with the best public interest and welfare of our Nation. His work as chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation will serve as a lasting monument to his career as a legislator.

ROYAL JOHNSON is gone but not forgotten.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we have one Member of the House who was with ROYAL JOHNSON in the thick of the fight. I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the decision to hold these exercises is most commendable. It is in keeping with the consistent regard and respect the distinguished chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation [Mr. RANKIN] shows at all times for the ex-service men of this country.

I spoke briefly to the House on August 3 about the life of ROYAL JOHNSON. I shall therefore not repeat today much I said at that time.

ROYAL C. JOHNSON was admittedly a casualty of the World War. But for the wounds he sustained and the effect thereof in later life few will doubt that he would be with us today.

Following his vote against the resolution declaring war, he enlisted in the Regular Army on January 4, 1918, and was assigned to Company K, Three Hundred and Thirteenth Regiment of Infantry, then at Camp Meade, Md., of which company he became sergeant. Later he was assigned to the Third Officers' Training Camp at Camp Meade and received a second lieutenant's commission on June 1, 1918. He was assigned to Company D of the Three Hundred and Thirteenth Regiment of Infantry, embarking with the Seventy-ninth Division for France. He remained with his regiment until a later date when he was wounded in action. On September 3, 1918, he was promoted to a first lieutenant, still assigned to Company D of the Three Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry.

It was my privilege to be an officer at the same time in the Three Hundred and Sixteenth Regiment of Infantry, both of the Seventy-ninth Division. When the famous American drive on September 26, 1918, took place, all will agree that the Seventy-ninth Division had one of the most important positions in that terrific offensive. Directly within the sector of the Seventy-ninth Division was Montfaucon. The great work of this division at Montfaucon is a matter of knowledge to many and enjoys, as it always will, a prominent place in every history of the World War. It was at Montfaucon that ROYAL was severely wounded. For that service he received the Distinguished Service Cross, the Purple Heart, and the French Croix de Guerre with gold star from the Republic of France. The wounds sustained by Royal in the Battle of Montfaucon were such that he was not permitted to be with his division the early part of October 1918 while occupying a defensive position in the Saint Mihiel sector and later in the final and big offensive battle which found his division in the front lines on Armistice Day.

Let us, in the performance of our important duties at this very critical period in the life of this Nation and the world, remember the lesson which knowledge and memory of the life of ROYAL C. JOHNSON so forcibly and manly portrays.

His war record is the envy of everyone, and along with his other great services to his country entitles him to a place in the land of perpetual peace and happiness to which I am sure he has been consigned.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, one of the many compensations of our service here is the privilege of association with men who are making history, men who have rendered and are rendering a notable service to their day and generation. That was particularly true of those of us who had the privilege of serving with ROYAL JOHNSON.

I shall not speak of his rare character, his distinguished service in the war, his brilliant record in the House. All these have been the subject of eloquent comment by those who have preceded me. But I do wish to refer to his earnest devotion to principle and his patriotic loyalty to his country, when the two conflicted under trying circumstances. In that respect his course was strikingly parallel to that of Robert E. Lee, the great southern leader, under similar conditions. General Lee opposed the idea of war between the States. He was not in sympathy with the formation of a separate government and deprecated the entrance of his own State into the war. But war having been declared, he followed her as a loyal son and was the first soldier, as he was the first citizen of the Confederacy. ROYAL JOHNSON opposed the entry of the United States into the World War. He took his political life in his hands to vote against the declaration of war. But the die having been cast and the issue drawn, he resigned his seat in the Congress and enlisted as a private for immediate overseas service. His soldierly qualities and his fighting record are eloquently evidenced by his successive promotions from private to first lieutenant in 11 months at the front, the Distinguished Service Cross awarded him by the United States and the Croix de Guerre with gold star conferred on him by the Republic of France. But it was on his return to Congress at the termination of the war that he rendered his greatest service to the Nation at large. He fathered and guided through the House the provision for the incorporation of the American Legion, and then turned his attention to the creation of a separate and special committee to handle World War veterans' legislation. Through his efforts, the committee was created as the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, and he served as its first chairman. In that position he was a pioneer, a pathfinder, a trail blazer, for conditions differed so greatly from those following other wars that it was necessary to establish precedents in a hitherto unexplored field of veterans' legislation. How successfully he performed that trying and difficult task is shown by the remarkable unanimity of the support given him by all parties and by both the Veterans' Administration and the various service organizations. The code which he initiated remains today after these strenuous years of stress and trial unchanged in fundamental conception and practical application. It constitutes a monument beyond any tribute which storied bronze or sculptured granite could pay.

Wearied and weakened by the weight of the infirmities occasioned by the all but mortal wounds received during the crucial campaign at Montfaucon, he voluntarily retired from Congress and now has answered the last roll call. He was a gallant soldier, a loyal friend, a wise legislator, an illustrious American.

On fame's eternal camping ground,
His silent tent is spread,
And glory guards with solemn round,
The bivouac of the dead.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who speak may be permitted to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD and that all other Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, ROYAL JOHNSON and I were bound by a golden cord of friendship that had many strong fibers.

First, he was a man whose character and whose attitudes were congenial and conducive to the warm friendship which existed between us.

Secondly, we were associated together in our work in this House at a time and under circumstances which could do no other than draw us into a close and friendly relationship. We stood together in a fight in this House that was vindicated by history, but which at the time was not popular with some of our colleagues.

Thirdly, we were brothers in arms throughout the first World War.

It gives me a sense of deep satisfaction to add that throughout the years that rolled by after ROYAL JOHNSON voluntarily ended his service in the House undefeated, that close and warm friendship between us continued up to the hour of his untimely passing.

ROYAL JOHNSON won the respect and the affection of those who knew him and were associated with him, because his nature was kindly; he was sturdily honest; he had the courage of his convictions; he was never afraid to say what he believed; and he was never afraid to stand firm and unwavering for what he conceived to be right.

Strong, firm, decided in his opinions, yet he was, withal, so gentle and kindly in his attitudes toward his colleagues and those associated with him as to never give wanton offense or to perpetuate a thoughtless hurt to others.

I think it may be truly said of this man that he was a fine American, an unwavering patriot, a good legislator, and excellent soldier, a sincere practitioner of the law, an honored member of his profession, and one who loved his fellowmen.

It is my conviction that no one who deserved it ever appealed to ROYAL JOHNSON for help without getting it if he could extend that help.

I would not have you believe that my friend's virtues set him apart from other men or made him unapproachable by others, because that would be exactly the opposite of his true character and temperament. He was a hail fellow well met; he was a man's man; his character and temperament were rugged, rough and ready, as well as fine and gentle.

There are many still in this body who knew ROYAL JOHNSON during his congressional service. To those of you who did not have the privilege of being associated with him, I say you truly missed a fine human experience in not knowing and working with him.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that we are pausing today to pay a tribute to the memory of ROYAL JOHNSON. The entire country owes him homage. The World War veterans owe him a debt of gratitude they will never be able to repay. Had it not been for his perseverance, his farsightedness, and all-consuming interest in the problems of the veteran it is doubtful that this House would have a Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation today. When it was formed in 1922 he, among all other veterans in Congress, was selected as chairman of the new committee because of his deep knowledge of the subject. A better selection could not have been made. From his service in the World War, as a private, a sergeant, and a commissioned officer, he had first-hand knowledge of the many, and at that time most complex, difficulties disabled veterans were having in establishing their claims with the Federal Government. The new committee was faced with problems which at the time seemed unsurmountable. As chairman he faced these with fearless courage, taking the hard way instead of the easier, striving for equitable treatment for those bearing the scars of war. There is no question but that his honesty and his personal popularity made it possible to achieve these objectives.

His home State of South Dakota, which sent him to Congress nine consecutive times, knew well of his ability to work and work hard in every position in which he was placed. He had served there as deputy State's attorney, State's attorney, and as attorney general before coming to Congress in December 1915. His retirement from political life was of his own choosing, as he declined to be a candidate for reelection to the Seventy-third Congress. He was truly a great South Dakotan.

I wish every boy and every girl in this country could know just how much he loved America. In these days of unrest at home and of war abroad, such patriotism as ROYAL JOHNSON had is a great inspiration. What a heritage he left his own children and the youth of America by his selfless service. ROYAL JOHNSON was one of the few who voted against the World War, and yet when war came and his country needed him, he was one of the first to enlist. He thought his country was wrong, but, like Stephen Decatur, it was "My country, right or wrong."

ROYAL JOHNSON knew from personal experience the bitter lessons of pain. His military service was a record of heroism and courage that so clearly marked his character in postwar years. For conspicuous bravery in action he was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross by his Government and the Croix de Guerre by a grateful France. His medals were not won without cost to him, however, for he was severely wounded at the front, and those who knew him well can testify that he suffered many hours of pain during his years of service in this Congress. That these old scars of battle shortened his life there is no doubt. The world at large never knew of his physical suffering, for it was hidden by a tireless activity and a ceaseless energy unrivaled by men of sound physique. When he died he was in the very prime of life, not an old man in years—only 57—but very old in experience and knowledge of his work and knowledge of the world.

Personally I came to know ROYAL JOHNSON well. When I came to Congress in 1925 it was my very great privilege to be appointed to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. Time has seen many changes, and today the present chairman and I are the only remaining members on that committee who served under ROYAL JOHNSON'S leadership. To know him, to work under him, was to admire his courage and his patriotism. He fought fair and fought hard for what he thought was right, but he was not hesitant in opposing measures that seem to him uncalled for.

The veterans of the World War miss him. We who knew him in Congress, who sought his advice and suggestions even after he left this House, miss him perhaps even more. Our country lost a brave and valiant soldier, a recognized statesman, and a citizen who had devoted his life to the service of others. But the spirit of ROYAL JOHNSON'S unselfishness and devotion to America marches on.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, our departed friend well deserves the unusual distinction now being paid his memory; that is, the holding of this hour long enough to mark it with proof of the love and esteem which his former colleagues bore him.

I have been here many years and during the time I have served in this House I have seen men come and go, some great, some less so, all good and all men of distinction in their respective districts; but of those I have seen come and go, there has not been one who had more of the elements of greatness woven into the fabric of his life or who carried more goodness in his heart or who had a better reason for being here than ROYAL JOHNSON.

He was a man whose personal, professional, and official integrity were perfect. He probably had more influence upon me than any man with whom I have ever served. He was a great lawyer, a great statesman, a great soldier, a distinguished author, a great American, and my friend. I loved him devotedly and join with the thousands who knew him in mourning his untimely passing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON].

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House except to say that I concur in the splendid tributes that have been paid here today to our deceased friend and former colleague, Hon. ROYAL JOHNSON. When I became a Member of this House he was a Member, and I had the honor and distinction of serving with him for a number of years. While we occupied different sides of the aisle, the aisle never separated our friendship or our affection. ROYAL JOHNSON was the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. He was a great man, an able legislator, and he was my friend. And I am glad to pay this simple but heartfelt tribute to his memory.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I desire merely to add a word to what my colleagues have said with reference to our departed friend the late lamented ROYAL C. JOHNSON. In the brief time that I shall take it is impossible to begin to recount the life history or pay a fitting tribute to this great, good man, who so indelibly impressed his life and character upon the people of the Nation.

If I remember correctly, the first time I ever heard of ROYAL JOHNSON I was a student in the University of Oklahoma, and he was an active and brilliant Member of this body. On January 4, 1918, the word was flashed around the world that a young man had actually resigned from Congress to enter the World War as a private soldier. The story said that the young man was very much opposed to war, but that when war was actually declared he felt he could not longer retain his membership in Congress after voting to draft other young men to answer the call to arms. The name of ROYAL JOHNSON immediately became a household word all over the land. It had a profound impression upon Congress, the country, and especially the young manhood of America. ROYAL JOHNSON set an example that will make future Congressmen stop, look, and listen before voting to send other men and boys into that awful carnage called war.

We heard of our departed friend many more times during that world conflict. A few months later, while I was in France, I recall reading of the daring feats of that stalwart young man who had risen from a private to a captain, a major, and later, I believe, to a lieutenant colonel. He was one of the real heroes of the World War. Later I saw and heard ROYAL JOHNSON at our national American Legion conventions and was delighted to know that he was so deeply interested in the welfare of his comrades in arms, especially the disabled veterans of that war and their dependent families.

It is needless to add that one of the first men I sought to meet when I came to Washington as an humble Member of this body was ROYAL JOHNSON. I found him to be brilliant, able, fair, and most reasonable. He was mild-mannered and unspoiled. As the years went by I learned to know him better, and, of course, to really know him was to love and admire him.

Although our friend and colaborer is gone to his reward, the memory of his splendid character, accomplishments, and friendship will always remain with us. His fine example is one that all of us might well emulate. America needs more men of his high caliber and sterling worth. May God bless his memory.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, ROYAL JOHNSON has been, and will continue to be, an inspiration to all patriotic Americans and especially to Members of Congress.

Royal was an intense patriot who genuinely loved his country. As a Member of Congress he fought to keep the United States from becoming embroiled in the World War, but being a true lover of democracy when the majority ruled otherwise and voted to declare war, ROYAL JOHNSON left Congress and enlisted as a private soldier to fight for his beloved country.

He so conducted himself that he became a hero during the war to every young American soldier.

When the war was over, he returned to Congress, and organized and led the legislative movement to properly care for the American boys who had suffered most in the common cause of their country.

ROYAL JOHNSON was the first chairman of the World War Veterans' Committee in Congress. Under his able leadership legislation creating the great Veterans' Administration was enacted. Most of the fundamental and basic acts dealing with the veterans' relief and welfare were enacted into law while he was chairman of the committee.

Royal was an able and fearless leader for right and, though personally a mild-mannered individual, he was a relentless leader in pushing remedial legislation. He was loved and respected while alive. He will always be loved and revered in death. His great influence will live on to be a living memorial, far more fitting and appropriate than any statues, memorial addresses, or other testimonials that his friends can ever create. His name and his cause will march on and on as a true monument to a great American.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the life of ROYAL C. JOHNSON, whose memory we commemorate today, should be an inspiration to the youth of our land; nay, more, it should refute completely those who preach the dark gospel of despair to the young men and women of America—the gospel that their opportunities for advancement have been greatly restricted and that henceforth many of them must look to the dole rather than to their own initiative.

Such a philosophy was as alien to the nature of ROYAL C. JOHNSON as anything could possibly be. He had sprung from that sturdy stock of old Americans who conquered a continent, foot by foot, and developed it into the greatest country of all time. Our distinguished friend was born in Iowa on October 3, 1882. The following March his family moved to South Dakota, when that State was yet a Territory and the hostile Sioux a serious problem. He grew to rugged manhood amidst the hardships and dangers of the frontier. At the age of 24 he graduated from the University of South Dakota and began the practice of law in his home town of Highmore. Shortly thereafter he was made assistant State's attorney and 2 years later State's attorney. At the age of 28 he became attorney general of the State of South Dakota, which position he filled with distinction for 4 years. In 1914 he was elected to Congress and served with fidelity and distinction in this body continuously for 18 years, save for the time that he served abroad in the armed forces of his country during the World War. After 18 years of outstanding service in this body he voluntarily retired to resume the practice of law.

ROYAL C. JOHNSON was in every sense a family man. He was happiest when surrounded by his family. He was an individual whom we were all proud to call "friend" and his was one of the closest friendships formed by me in the nearly quarter of century service in this body. I was en route to Europe when word came to me that this gigantic oak had toppled over in an unexpected storm. His passing created a scar that even time cannot fully heal.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, when, through the efforts of Mr. JOHNSON, the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation was created, it was feared that as a veteran he might not be wholly impartial, and two of us who had been beyond the age limit at the time of the war were chosen to be with him to offset any tendency he might show toward undue friendship for the soldier. I was one of the two and while he was a member sat with him. There came no occasion for the apprehension. I wish to add to the deserved tributes that have been made to him simply a recognition of his independence and his fairness. Always in time of peace as in time of war his first thought was of the welfare of his country.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a most unusual but deserving tribute.

It was my pleasure to meet ROYAL JOHNSON the day he came to Washington as a Member of this body. Well do I remember the day he left to go to war and well do I remember his return. Wounded in action, no one ever heard him mention his disabilities, but those of us who really knew him were always aware of his sufferings.

On his return he was placed in charge of an investigation of expenditures during the period of the war. Out of that investigation testimony covering 20 or more volumes was printed, but in the end ROYAL JOHNSON, a Republican, told the world nothing was found that showed any official had violated a public trust.

The Democratic Party was in control during the period of the war. There was no attempt on the part of that committee to cast reflections upon those charged with expenditures of billions.

His work as chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation has already been told. The World War veterans can and do thank ROYAL JOHNSON for many of the benefits they now enjoy.

Little did I feel when I saw him at the Emergency Hospital, after he suffered injuries by being struck by an automobile, that in so short a period I would be in Arlington Cemetery while he was being laid to rest.

ROYAL JOHNSON was my friend and I cherished his friendship.

The history of our country that does not contain the record of ROYAL JOHNSON during the World War and the years that followed will be incomplete.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] such time as he may desire.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am happy as a Member of Congress and as a World War veteran to join in this tribute to a former colleague and comrade for whom I had both admiration and affection.

When I first came to Congress ROYAL JOHNSON was one of the experienced and influential Members of this House. A member of the Rules Committee, chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, a member of the Republican steering committee, at 46 years of age he had already served in this body for 13 years. He extended a helping hand to me on many occasions and I formed with him a friendship which endured through the years of our service here together, through the years after his voluntary retirement from public life, up to the day of his death.

Only the evening before he died he telephoned me in my office. He had heard that I was going to Europe. Characteristically, he wanted to give me some suggestions and to send me in the morning a letter that he thought would be helpful. The letter was never written. Before he could return to his office in the morning "taps" had sounded. He had been called to his reward.

Mr. Speaker, ROYAL JOHNSON served his country with real distinction both in time of war and in time of peace.

His retirement from Congress to enlist as a private in the Regular Army in the World War; his several promotions to the rank of first lieutenant; the wounds which he received in action at Montfaucon; the Distinguished Service Cross, the Order of the Purple Heart, and the Croix de Guerre with star, which he won on the battlefield, speak eloquently of his desire to serve, his ability to lead, and his valiant conduct in time of war.

His splendid work in this House in the course of which he fought so strongly and so fairly for the best interests of his comrades in arms, speaks no less emphatically of his patriotic service in time of peace. All of us who served with him here will bear witness to his character, his integrity, and his courage as a national legislator and a leader in public life.

ROYAL JOHNSON devoted himself to public service for 33 years. His long career as deputy State's attorney, as State's attorney, as attorney general, and as a Member of Congress for 18 years emphasizes the confidence which he enjoyed among those whom he was privileged to serve.

A valiant soldier, an able and resourceful lawyer, a distinguished public servant, a true and loyal friend, our departed colleague and comrade stood for all that is best in American life. His memory will not fade, Mr. Speaker, from the minds and hearts of those fortunate enough to be included in his wide circle of friends in every walk of life. [Applause.]

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include at this point copies of the citations which he won in France, together with a further tribute appearing in the January issue of the South Dakota Bar Journal:

CITATIONS AWARDED TO LT. ROYAL C. JOHNSON

The Distinguished Service Cross: "For extraordinary heroism at Montfaucon September 26 and 27, 1918. He constantly exposed himself to the enemy fire during the action at Montfaucon, setting an example to his men by his fearlessness. When severely wounded by shell fire, he assisted two wounded men of his company to the rear and refused to occupy space in the ambulance until these men had been provided for."

The French Croix de Guerre with star: "A very brave officer, exposed himself to the enemy's fire during the attack on Montfaucon and set an example of courage for his men. Though wounded by shell splinters, he brought aid to two wounded men of his company and refused to enter the ambulance before them."

ROYAL CLEAVES JOHNSON

(By Dawes E. Brisbane)

On a shady slope in Arlington stands a simple marker indicating the last resting place of ROYAL C. JOHNSON. From the beauty and dignity of that historic hillside overlooking the Nation's Capital "those who also served" maintain their eternal guard over the living spirit of the Republic. The greatest posthumous honor was rightly bestowed when he was committed to the imperishable community of that deathless legion.

ROYAL JOHNSON represented South Dakota for 18 years as a Member of Congress. First elected in 1914, he continued that service until his voluntary retirement in 1933. When the United States entered the World War, against which he courageously cast his vote in the House, he enlisted as a private in an infantry regiment of the Regular Army. Later assigned to the Third Officers' Training Camp, he was commissioned and assigned to the Three Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry. While leading his command through the shambles that was Montfaucon he was left behind seriously wounded. The Distinguished Service Cross was awarded for his conspicuous bravery that day. France also conferred upon him the Croix de Guerre with gold star.

The armistice found Lieutenant JOHNSON in a base hospital. His recovery was sufficient to permit being invalided home, where he resumed his place on the floor of the House December 17, 1918. He fathered the bill incorporating the American Legion. He sponsored many laws for the relief of disabled soldiers. He was chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Legislation from its creation until he retired from Congress.

Royal was a constant member of the South Dakota Bar Association from his admission in 1906. During the earlier years of that period he served as State's attorney of Hyde County and two terms as attorney general of South Dakota. A member of the District of Columbia Bar, he had been actively engaged in the practice of his profession in Washington since his retirement from public life. In this work he was eminently successful.

Born in Cherokee, Iowa, October 3, 1882, his parents brought him to South Dakota the following year. He attended public schools at Highmore and Pierre and college at Yankton. He earned his law degree at the University of South Dakota in 1906.

A great athlete, Royal played a hard, heady game of tackle on the varsity and for many years was the outstanding baseball catcher in the State. His ability to negotiate the "tough ones" gained for him the lasting nickname "Sod Grabber." In other activities he brilliantly held a place on the university debating team and, as in later life, he was at all times a leader among his associates. By doing odd jobs during the school months and playing semiprofessional baseball during the summer he was able to complete his education.

His marriage to Florence Thode in 1907 was the fulfillment of a college romance. Two stalwart sons survive to give solace to their bereaved mother. They are Everett Royal Johnson, a successful engineer and member of the bar, and Lt. Harlan Thode Johnson, of the United States Navy.

Royal was a member of the Phi Delta Theta, Delta Theta Phi (law), the Masons, and the Elks. He belonged to the Metropolitan, the National Press, the University, and the Chevy Chase Clubs in Washington. He was a Republican and a Congregationalist.

A soldier of valor, a statesman of great integrity, a lawyer of high ethics, he was with all a friend of boundless loyalty.

In his last public utterance, before a large gathering in the House Office Building assembled there to do him honor, he expressed the modest and simple hope that some of those who may come after might say of him, "With all his limitations he did his best." Thus, prophetically, did he give voice to his own epitaph.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH asked and obtained unanimous consent to extend his remarks by including copies of citations awarded for gallantry in action in France and a further brief tribute appearing in the January edition of the South Dakota Bar Journal.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a rare occasion. The Congress of the United States in honoring the memory of the late ROYAL C. JOHNSON, former Member of Congress from South Dakota, pays a tribute to the achievements that characterized his busy and useful life.

I like to remember the deceased as I first knew him as a Member of Congress when he was named as the chairman of the newly formed World War Veterans' Committee of the House of Representatives.

As a former lieutenant with the Three Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division, A. E. F., at Montfaucon, France, he performed an act of heroism so outstanding that a grateful Government conferred upon him the Distinguished Service Cross.

This former officer constantly exposed himself to enemy fire, setting a brave example to his men by his fearlessness prompted by his love of country. This record of service and the fact that he was likewise distinguished in civil life for his many noble traits of character, combined to make his selection universally acclaimed by veterans throughout the country.

During my many years of active participation as a National and State officer in the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States I had an opportunity to become intimately acquainted with ROYAL C. JOHNSON and from this association learned to appreciate the many splendid qualities of his richly gifted soul.

His thorough knowledge of the problems confronting the World War veteran and his dependents and his splendid leadership of the World War Veterans' Committee laid the foundation for the Federal Government's present veteran-welfare program.

As a Member of Congress his position did not remove him from the daily comradeship of his World War veteran buddies, and he was found holding an active membership and office in the great veteran organizations of our country. He was constantly visiting veteran hospitals and giving a word of cheer to those helpless comrades to whom death would be a welcome respite from the daily pain and anguish that wracked their bodies and distorted their minds.

At Montfaucon, France, the heorism of ROYAL C. JOHNSON and all American soldiers is recognized by a beautiful monument; while here in the United States every Government hospital for disabled veterans stands as a monument to this distinguished veteran for his devotion to the welfare of America's disabled veterans and their dependents.

If the veterans of the World War, 4,000,000 strong, could join me in this Chamber today, I know their voices would blend with mine in saying, "Our comrade, ROYAL C. JOHNSON, is gone but not forgotten."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN].

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, many are the disabled veterans, their widows and orphans in this land of ours today whose lives are just a little sweeter and whose burdens just a little easier to bear because of the untiring efforts, the kindly heart, and the understanding mind of the late great American in whose memory we are today doing honor; the first chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, the Honorable ROYAL C. JOHNSON.

Although his work here on earth is finished, his high ideals still live and will live so long as friendship and true patriotism warm the hearts of men.

ROYAL JOHNSON knew the innermost desire of his genuine American fellow men was to observe the golden rule—to do unto others as you would have them do unto you.

ROYAL JOHNSON knew that the great majority of Americans would want the defenders of Old Glory treated justly and fairly, for such has been the expression of our people since the Declaration of Independence.

ROYAL JOHNSON knew that a just pension system was not only very necessary for a free system of government, but also that it would be the most economical for the taxpayers of this Nation to maintain.

He knew that every American boy and girl who had studied history had the knowledge that the veterans of every war in which the United States had ever engaged had been compensated as justly as could be devised by the various administrations of our Government. And for that very reason these same boys and girls have always responded to the call for volunteers, thereby making it unnecessary for the United States to maintain a huge conscription army which would cost more than the amount awarded to those veterans who had served their country and to their dependents.

ROYAL JOHNSON knew, as do most informed people, that the veterans of many warring nations in Europe after the close of the World War were aggravated by the treatment they received at the hands of their respective governments, and that aggravation is the cause for much of the unrest in Europe today.

The American veteran returned home after the World War singing the praises of his Government. ROYAL JOHNSON was among those returning soldiers; he carried his loyalty and devotion to his country from the battlegrounds of war-torn Europe back to the Halls of Congress that breathes the very essence of American democracy. And he strove mightily to the end that all of those who served their country would be properly rewarded. God rest his soul.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield two and a half minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, during my years of service in this House I have found my greatest happiness and satisfaction in watching men on both sides of the aisle develop in ability, in character, and in service, and among these men none stands in my affection beyond that of our dear friend, ROYAL JOHNSON. I said to him when we first became acquainted and I could evaluate his qualities that it was fortunate and appropriate he was named "Royal," for, certainly, he was a son of the king. He had kingly qualities of courage, intelligence, and faithfulness. The sources of his wisdom, his tolerance, and his sense of justice lay deep in that silent, spiritual world from which all true men draw inspiration and guidance.

A few years ago on a glorious August day I stood at Montfaucon, in France, representing this body in the dedication of a great war monument. The President of France spoke, the President of the United States sent a message across the sea, great generals were there, great armies were massed, but the supreme moment came when three young men stood up, all Army chaplains, one a Roman Catholic priest, one a Protestant preacher, and one a little Jewish rabbi who had lost his eyes in that grim battle, and as the crowd stood with bowed heads these young heroes of the faith lifted their hands toward the blue sky and called upon the one power that underlies this world and every other world to which we belong, the power of God; and it was in the faith of His presence and His power that ROYAL JOHNSON found inspiration for his courage, for his industry, for his self-sacrifice, and I cannot help but feel that today, as he stands in the sunlit presence of his divine Creator, if he could give us a message, it would be, "Still keep your faith in the God in whose service I was willing to lay down my life; keep your faith in the great principles of freedom for which I stood and our country has stood from the beginning. Carry on and thus be worthy of those of us who have gone before."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, if I can voice the sentiments of South Dakota today, it would be one of appreciation for the courtesy and the thoughtfulness of the House in setting aside this hour in memory of ROYAL JOHNSON.

I would speak for a few minutes about the South Dakota background of ROYAL JOHNSON, because only as you know the soil out of which a man springs, and only as you know something of the sunshine and the rain of his early years do you really understand the man.

Royal was the son of an early South Dakota printer. His father established the Highmore Herald, and lost it in the depression of 1893. Those were the days when the homesteader was invading the cattle country. Young JOHNSON knew what it was to pick up buffalo chips for fuel at home, to pull an old Washington hand press for his father at the print shop, and to punch cows for ranchers to get spending cash.

He worked his way through the State university by playing semipro baseball in the summer, back in those days when it was both moral and legal to sweat and when "sit down" strikes were unknown. No one should wonder that the Republicans frequently won the congressional ball games during his playing days here. They only ended when war wounds got his legs.

Others speak of Royal as a Member of Congress who voted against the war, then enlisted as a private in an officers' training camp, where he won a first lieutenant's commission. The truth is that he was captain of a South Dakota National Guard company that for 3 years ran off with honors at the national encampments. He could have asked for a major's field commission had he not had conscientious scruples against doing things the easy way. Incidentally, following his death last summer, I introduced a bill to give him a promotion and place him on the emergency officers' retired list, a bill which has not yet been reported by the committee that has it in charge.

After graduation from law school, Royal went back to his home town to break into law practice. He literally did just that. He opposed the town banker and the established legal patriarch by taking the case of a Civil War veteran on whose farm the bank was seeking to foreclose a mortgage. He won the case and saved the farm.

At 25 he ran for county attorney, bucking the local machine. Civil War veterans carried his campaign by horse and buggy to every home in the county. He lost the county-seat town, but he won the country and the election.

That assured him an income of $400 a year. He promptly went to Arizona and persuaded a girl he had met at the university that he was now a man of affluence. She became Florence Johnson, now known and loved by many Washington people.

Two years later his university friends scattered throughout the State backed him, and at 28 he became the youngest attorney general in the United States. And such were the times and such were the ideals of my father that we hitched up the team for a 24-mile drive to hear ROYAL JOHNSON deliver the high-school commencement address at the county seat. That was in the spring of 1912, I think, and gave me my first sight of ROYAL JOHNSON.

As attorney general, he cleaned up a lot of old legal practices in the State, and it was generally accepted that he would go on to other honors. In one campaign it is said that he came to a stream swollen by floods. Others in the party turned back, but Royal stripped, rolled his clothes into a ball, threw them across, and then swam the stream and went on to keep his speaking date.

He was elected to Congress in 1914, and represented the old Second District for 18 years, the longest period a South Dakotan has served. He succeeded another distinguished South

Dakotan, the Honorable Charles Burke, who served for 14 years and then went on to other posts in service of the Nation, and who is here with us today. Of ROYAL JOHNSON'S service in Congress, I need add nothing to what others are saying.

Royal never forgot his close comrades in arms. He was one of the incorporators of the first American Legion posts in the country, the original General Pershing Post, of Washington, later renamed George Washington Post, No. 1. That was March 5, 1919, 10 days before the meetings in Paris. A few days before he died he contacted me to see if he could help in arranging a transfer to a diagnostic center for Hook Phares, a grand old soldier. Hook had put up his age to go to the Philippines in 1898, and later put it down to go to France with the National Guard outfit for whom he cooked on the Mexican border. On the front lines, when Royal was wounded, Hook nursed him until he could be hospitalized. Royal sent word to me, "Do everything you can for Hook. He saved my life." Only a few days after we saw Royal laid away in Arlington Cemetery I saw Hook at Hines Hospital, Chicago. He was only a shadow of the man he had been, a misshapen wreck in the last throes of stomach cancer. But he asked about Royal's death, and Royal's last comment about him helped another soldier to die in peace.

When the service was over at Arlington last August some of us saw a sacred, simple, eloquent thing happen. One of Royal's sons, supporting his mother on his arm, turned smartly toward the grave, drew himself to full attention, then gave his father a soldier's salute. That was his farewell.

We all salute him today—a great South Dakotan, a true American.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PETERSON].

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I did not have the privilege of serving with our colleague and comrade, the late ROYAL JOHNSON, but I have been able to see the work done by him and the groundwork laid by him as chairman of the committee of which the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi is now chairman and which I have the privilege of being a member.

As the elected head of War Veterans in Congress, which numbers more than 185 Members in the House and Senate, I pay tribute to Hon. ROYAL JOHNSON on behalf of all war veterans in Congress.

Colleague is a precious name. Associations in the Halls of Congress form eternal friendships, and those who were able to call ROYAL JOHNSON colleague and who served with him have today paid a fine and deserved tribute to that brave soldier, courageous legislator, and that fine American. You have called him colleague and friend. You have referred to the fine services which he rendered. Going back in the records of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, you will find that before the war and after the war, as well as the service he rendered on the field of battle during the war, he was always rendering service. He was stalwart and courageous in his views. He dared to do that which he thought to be just, and he stood by his convictions. Having voted against a declaration of war, in the concluding statement of a speech he made on the floor of this House he said:

> No Member of the Congress will do more to assist a vigorous prosecution of the war than I will.

This he did well and nobly and in such a manner as to deserve the commendation of those who called him colleague, or those who called him friend, and those many more who called him comrade.

Throughout the Nation today those who are recipients of benefits, those who are in hospitals, those who are getting compensation or pensions, can well be grateful for the early work which ROYAL JOHNSON did when he was pioneering, so to speak, in the field of World War veterans' legislation. I add my voice to the many voices that have been raised today in paying tribute to a colleague, to a friend, to a comrade, to a great citizen, to a brave soldier, and a distinguished Member of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time on this side to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], who now represents the district that ROYAL JOHNSON represented in this House for 18 years.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 2½ minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from South Dakota 2½ minutes.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, on that sad day last August when ROYAL C. JOHNSON answered the last roll call, America lost a distinguished citizen, and South Dakota lost a favorite son. Having the responsibility which I now have of representing the district which he so well represented for 18 years, I have come to know what the people of his home district thought about ROYAL JOHNSON.

As I travel the highways and the byways of this district, as we Congressmen must every other year, I have met both the citizens of his own party and those who opposed him in election, and I have found them all sharing and reflecting the same attitudes and opinions about ROYAL JOHNSON which have been so eloquently expressed here today by his colleagues. ROYAL JOHNSON had and has a host of friends in his home district, and in his home State of South Dakota. Nothing which he ever did or said cost him the friendship of the people of his home State, including both those of the party supporting him and those of the party opposing him. After the election and between campaigns all recognized the valor and gallantry and friendship and patriotism of ROYAL JOHNSON.

As the Representative of that district which was his, I thank you all for your courtesy and thoughtfulness in setting this hour apart from our busy lives and dedicating it to the memory of ROYAL JOHNSON. As I listened to this ceremony I could not help recalling a statement which he made to a group of fellows sitting in a hotel room, not as the expression of a politician speaking from a platform, where he might have been inclined to engage in something resembling demagogy, but in private conversation with some friends during that interim of time between when war was declared in Europe and the time when this country became involved. Speaking to a group of his friends he said one night, "I can never make myself come to the point where I shall vote to put this country into war unless in the same speech in which I recommend our entrance I also announce the fact that I am willing to fight for the cause to which I would be offering the living sacrifices of thousands and millions of mothers throughout America."

I have reflected since that he not only kept that pledge he made to some friends of his, but that when he had to meet the challenge he did something even more significant. Having weighed the evidence and decided in his opinion that America should have no part in the active conflict of that war, having appeased his conscience by voting against the entrance into war, in spite of that, he volunteered his services as a private and marched gallantly into war, and when there, took a leading part, as has been so eloquently expressed by those who were friends of his, in the front line trenches, in the front lines of those going over the top, getting wounded, winning the highest military distinctions and honors this Government can bestow. Then he came back again to serve the cause of peace, because at the time of his death ROYAL JOHNSON belonged to the Committee to Keep America Out of War, and he stood at that time as he stood throughout his career, an opponent of war, a believer that America can make her best contribution to the world by maintaining a peace in which men govern themselves.

I am sure that if ROYAL C. JOHNSON could have his way today he would want this ceremony dedicated to the hope that the men of this Congress will, and the Executive of this Nation will, adhere steadfastly to a policy of peace, and convey to all the world that this country will not again send American boys to die on foreign soil. By so doing we can give substance today to the ideals for which ROYAL C. JOHNSON made so many sacrifices.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi has yielded me one-half minute. I yield that to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to participate in tribute to the late ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota, lawyer, soldier, statesman, and all-round American. His career of public service to his State and to his country was a long one and an honorable and distinguished one. He interrupted his service in Congress to enlist in the Army in January 1918. He served in the Three Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry as private, sergeant, second lieutenant, and first lieutenant, and was wounded in September 1918. The luster of his military record is enhanced by the fact that he was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross by the United States Government and the Croix de Guerre with gold star by the Republic of France. Returning to Congress, he became the first chairman of the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation; and while his legislative interests and activities were comprehensive, he is probably best remembered and most loved for his distinguished and unselfish service to veterans of all wars of the United States in general and to the American veterans of the World War in particular. He served his country and his fellow man in war and in peace. He was for many years a distinguished Member of this body. In all of it he was a human, kindly, lovable character, with friends everywhere. We in Nebraska were proud to have ROYAL JOHNSON as our neighbor. He visited us many times; and by his speeches, his friendliness, and his good humor he endeared himself to the people of a State wherein his circle of personal acquaintances was large.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, having served with ROYAL JOHNSON for many years as ranking Democrat on the Veterans' Committee while he was chairman, and 2 years as chairman while he was the ranking Republican, I am probably in a better position than any other man alive to understand the heartaches that he experienced in his services in that capacity.

He was a worthy and splendid chairman and his heart beat in sympathy for the disabled veterans of the World War. He was my friend.

Someone has said:

I wrote my name upon the sand
And trusted it would stand for aye,
But soon the refluent sea
Had washed my feeble words away.

I carved my name upon the wood
And after years returned again.
I missed the shadow of the tree
That stretched of old upon the plain.

The solid marble next my name
I gave as a perpetual trust,
An earthquake rent it to its base,
Now it lies o'er laid with dust.

All these had failed; I was perplexed.
I turned and asked myself, What then?
If I would have my name endure,
I'll write it on the hearts of men.

ROYAL JOHNSON wrote his name on the hearts of his fellow men, and especially upon the hearts of his colleagues in this House. He was a patriot; he was a worthy representative of his country on the field of battle; but, above all, he had the courage and patriotism to vote his convictions as a Member of this body.

I was one of the last Members who ever conferred with him. Among other things, he said, "I have a grandson, Royal Johnson, 2d. God forbid that he should ever be called to fight the Nation's battles on foreign soil." He was for peace; for keeping America out of entangling alliances and for keeping American soldiers out of foreign countries. That was one of the burdens of his heart. He was for the safety of small nations; he believed in making the world safe for democracy. But he wanted to see the end of these useless, senseless wars that are today threatening the destruction of civilization. He longed to live to see the restoration of world peace, the dawn of that golden age of which Tennyson dreamed when he said:

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;
Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;
Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rained a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue;
Far along the world-wide whisper of the south-wind rushing warm,
With the standards of the peoples plunging through the thunderstorm;
Till the war-drum throbbed no longer and the battle-flags furled
In the parliament of man—the federation of the world.
There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

STATE ACCOUNT OF ADVANCES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State and the accompanying draft of proposed legislation designed to permit the Secretary of State to authorize disbursements of appropriated funds under a "State account of advances."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

PRESIDENTIAL THIRD TERMS

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, last week there came from the Legislature of the State of New York a resolution calling upon the Congress of the United States to take adequate, expedient, and proper steps to limit the length of the tenure of office of a President to two terms. Accordingly, I am introducing, at this time, joint resolutions to this effect, which I will proceed to read as long as my time permits.

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to the ineligibility of a President to a third term

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. No person who has twice been elected to the office of President shall again be eligible to be elected to such office or to execute such office for the whole or any part of another term.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified by an amendment to the Constitution within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by Congress."

Joint resolution prohibiting payment of compensation for a President during his third term of office

Resolved, etc., That no part of any appropriation heretofore or hereafter made shall be available to pay compensation of any President for any period during which he is executing that office during a third term.

Taking my cue from the Senate of New York State—my home State—I am today introducing legislation in the Congress dealing with the subject of a third term for the President of the United States. As a Member of Congress from the State of New York, I feel it a duty to attempt to reflect the wishes of the legislature of my home State upon the subject.

On September 17, 1796, George Washington, first President of the United States, delivered his Farewell Address to the American people. On that day the Father of our Country set down certain suggestions for the guidance of the American people. He openly refused to seek election for the third successive time even though it was within his easy reach. Had he chosen to do so, he could have made himself a totalitarian; but by his refusal to seek election for the third time, he established a tradition that to this day has remained unbroken.

In his Farewell Address President Washington said:

The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper * * * to decline being considered among the number of those of whom a choice is to be made.

I believe that this tradition established by Washington, of not seeking election to the Presidency for a third term, forms the one remaining bulwark protecting the people of this Nation against the threat of the establishment of a dictatorship. If the calamity of a dictatorship should come to pass, the minorities, whose rights are now guaranteed under our Constitution, will be placed in jeopardy. They will be accorded the same treatment now given them in certain countries of Europe.

It is, I am sure, the intent of the New York State Legislature by its resolution to urge the Congress of the United States to enact suitable legislation to prevent any President from seeking a third term. In this matter I am glad to be an instrument to bring that desire before the House at this time.

ALBANY, February 26, 1940.

Whereas on September 17, 1796, George Washington, first President of the United States, delivered his Farewell Address to the American people; and

Whereas on that day the Father of Our Country set down certain suggestions for the guidance of the American people; and

Whereas by his refusal to seek election for the third time he established a tradition that to this day has remained unbroken; and

Whereas in his Farewell Address President Washington said: "Friends and citizens, the period for a new election of a citizen, to administer the Executive Government of the United States, being not far distant, and the time actually arrived, when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person, who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution that I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made."; and

Whereas this tradition of a President of the United States of not seeking election for a third term forms the one remaining bulwark protecting the people of this Nation against the threat of the establishment of a dictatorship; and

Whereas with the establishment of a dictatorship the minorities now accorded their rights under our Constitution will be swept aside and accorded the same treatment now given them in certain countries of Europe: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Congress of the United States be and hereby is memoralized to enact suitable legislation to prevent any President from seeking a third term and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each Member of Congress from New York State.

By order of the senate.

WILLIAM S. KING, Clerk.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALL] just stated that the New York State Legislature passed a resolution to prevent any President from seeking a third term. However, as I understand it, every senator and assemblyman of the State legislature who voted for that resolution was a Republican. The Republicans of New York State know that if President Roosevelt is renominated he will be reelected and carry the State of New York, which they would like to prevent. [Applause.]

I am surprised that a Republican Member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York should rise on this floor and comment on a resolution adopted by Republicans in both branches of the New York State Legislature relative to the question of a third term. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am not so much concerned with the resolution that you have just heard read, but I am very frank to admit that as a Republican I would like to see President Roosevelt renominated by the Democratic Party on the third-term issue so that it can be decided by the American people. This question was not decided alone by George Washington. I do not know whether he was a Republican or a Democrat. The third-term issue was decided by those great Democratic Presidents Thomas Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, and it became part and parcel of the principles of the Democratic Party and part of the Democratic political creed. It was reaffirmed by Democratic Senators voting against a third term for Calvin Coolidge. The American people are against a third term and the setting up of a dictatorship in the United States. [Applause.]

BARRING OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8150, providing for the barring of claims against the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the author of the bill, the gentleman from Missouri, explain the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill was referred to the Expenditures Committee by the Comptroller General. It came in the form of the Annual Report of the Comptroller General through the Speaker of the House. There is no State in the Union that does not have a statute of limitations, but the Government has no general statute of limitations. The Comptroller General has annually urged the passage of a bill such as this, providing a statute of limitations for the filing of claims at the expiration of 6 years. The committee amended the bill and provided for a 10-year limitation rather than 6 years.

The Comptroller General called the attention of the Congress to the fact that tens of thousands of claims are filed annually, some growing out of the Revolutionary period, others out of the War of 1812–14, others out of the War with Mexico, the Civil War, the Indian War, the Spanish War, and so forth. Whenever a claim is filed, it is necessary to examine the old records. The great majority of the claims are denied, but the cost to the General Accounting Office for personnel to investigate the claims is tremendous. The General Accounting Office is overworked. It needs the personnel used to investigate claims for other purposes. Under the provisions of the bill as drawn by the General Accounting Office, where a claim is filed and the statute of limitations prevails, all that is necessary to do is to send a copy of the law to the claimant.

This bill absolutely affects no particular class of claims, as the gentleman seems to surmise. I know the gentleman is very much interested in Indian claims, but this bill has no bearing upon them whatever.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, the gentleman's bill applies to all Indian claims? And as the gentleman is always active about Indian bills, naturally I am concerned about his bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not know that it would apply to Indian claims, but the gentleman knows the Indians cannot sue the Government without the Government's consent. This is the reason Members come here asking for the passage of jurisdictional bills.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What is the gentleman's opinion on this question; suppose we pass the gentleman's bill; would that foreclose any further action on the part of Congress in passing jurisdictional bills?

Mr. COCHRAN. Absolutely not. It would have no bearing on the passage of any jurisdictional act. There is no connection whatever between this bill and a jurisdictional bill granting the Indians the right to go to the Court of Claims, or between this bill and any cases already pending there.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does not the gentleman believe his bill is of sufficient importance that it should require consideration by the House before being passed?

Mr. COCHRAN. I may say that the Comptroller General has recommended this bill annually. He states that a very large amount of money is being spent in investigating these claims that should be saved. We provide a 6-year statute of limitations on the right of veterans to sue the Government under their war-risk insurance. If we can deny a man who has fought for his country the right to file a claim against the Government afer 6 years, then we ought to be able to deny to other citizens the right to file claims that are 100 years old; 10 years is certainly reasonable. Let me say again to the gentleman that this has absolutely no bearing upon any jurisdictional acts granting Indians the right to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not believe we should deny the veteran or any other person the right to present his claim after 6 or 10 years, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COCHRAN. The law affecting the veteran's right to file claims is already in the statute books. This bill does not affect that statute.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then why does the gentleman want to pass this bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. To outlaw all claims against the Government after a period of 10 years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana objects. Is there further objection?

Mr. KRAMER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three objections are required. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every claim or demand against the United States cognizable by the General Accounting Office under section 305 of the Budget and Accounting Act of June 10, 1921 (42 Stat. 24), and the act of April 10, 1928 (45 Stat. 413), shall be forever barred unless such claim, bearing the signature and address of the claimant or of an authorized attorney, shall be received in said Office within 10 full years after the date such claim first accrued: Provided, That when a claim of any person serving in the military or naval forces of the United States accrues in time of war, or when war intervenes within 5 years after its accrual, such claim may be presented within 5 years after peace is established.

SEC. 2. Whenever any claim barred by section 1 shall be received in the General Accounting Office, it shall be returned to the claimant with a copy of this act, and such action shall be a complete response without further communication.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT: On page 1, line 8, after "authorized", insert "agent or."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have offered this amendment to the bill, to have the words "agent or" inserted after the word "authorized," in line 8, because there may be some legal question as to whether the word "attorney" includes "agent," or whether "agent" includes "attorney." This is merely clarifying language so that if you are not an attorney you may be authorized to act as an agent for the individual who makes the claim, and the claim would have the same status as if it had been filed by the individual or by an attorney.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have no objection to the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF CROP-LOAN LAW

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7878, to amend the crop-loan law relating to the lien imposed thereunder, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST GRADUATES OF CERTAIN SCHOOLS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1610, to prevent discrimination against graduates of certain schools, and those acquiring their legal education in law offices, in the making of appointments to Government positions the qualifications for which include legal training or legal experience.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me this bill should come up and be considered under a rule of the House. It is a very important measure. It may be very far reaching. I believe the Members have a right to free and open discussion of the bill. The lawyers of the Government have the handling of claims and the protection of the rights of the Government in cases involving millions of dollars, and also Mr. Justice Reed's Committee on Civil Service Improvement has not yet sent in a report. That committee was appointed and is giving extensive study to the problem of legal positions in the Government. I think we should wait until after that time before acting on this bill, and therefore I shall be obliged to object.

Mr. ELLIS and Mr. LEWIS of Colorado also objected, and the bill was stricken from the calendar.

MILEAGE TABLES FOR THE UNITED STATES ARMY AND OTHER GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 506, relating to mileage tables for the United States Army and other Government agencies, and to mileage allowances for persons employed in the offices of Members of House and Senate.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

DELAWARE TRIBE OF INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6535, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Delaware Tribe of Indians on account of permanent annuities under treaty provision.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF LAWS GOVERNING FEDERAL PRISONERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7343, to amend certain laws governing Federal prisoners and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 901; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 746), be amended to read as follows:

"That on the discharge from any institution of any person convicted under the laws of the United States he shall be furnished with transportation to the place of conviction or place of bona fide residence within the United States at the time of his commitment under sentence of the court, or to such place within the United States as may be authorized by the Attorney General. In the direction of the Attorney General, he may also be furnished with suitable clothing and an amount of money not to exceed $20. For the furnishing of such clothing and money charge shall be made and allowed in the accounts of the said institution with the United States."

SEC. 2. Section 3 of the act of May 13, 1930 (46 Stat. 272; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 723c), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. The said Board, or any member thereof, shall hereafter have the exclusive authority to issue warrants for the retaking of any United States prisoner who has violated his parole. The unexpired term of imprisonment of any such prisoner shall begin to run from the date he is returned to the custody of the Attorney General under said warrant, and the time the prisoner was on parole shall not diminish the time he was originally sentenced to serve."

SEC. 3. Section 5 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 820; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 718), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That any officer of any Federal, penal, or correctional institution or any Federal officer authorized to serve criminal process within the United States, to whom such warrant shall be delivered, is authorized and required to execute such warrant by taking such prisoner and returning him to the custody of the Attorney General. All necessary expenses incurred in the administration of this act shall be paid out of the appropriation for the institution in connection with which such expense was incurred, and such appropriation is hereby made available therefor."

SEC. 4. Section 6 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 820; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 719), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. When a prisoner has been retaken upon a warrant issued by the Board of Parole, he shall be given an opportunity to appear before said Board of Parole, a member thereof, or an examiner designated by the Board. The said Board may then, or at any time in its discretion, revoke the order and terminate such parole or modify the terms and conditions thereof. If such order of parole shall be revoked and the parole so terminated, the said prisoner shall serve the remainder of the sentence originally imposed; and the time the prisoner was out on parole shall not be taken into account to diminish the time for which he was sentenced."

SEC. 5. Section 5296 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 641) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5296. When a poor convict, sentenced by any court of the United States to be imprisoned and pay a fine, or fine and costs, or to pay a fine, or fine and costs, has been confined in prison 30 days, solely for the nonpayment of such fine, or fine and costs, such convict may make application in writing to any commissioner of the United States court in the district where he is imprisoned setting forth his inability to pay such fine, or fine and costs, and after notice to the district attorney of the United States, who may appear, offer evidence, and be heard, the commissioner shall proceed to hear and determine the matter. If on examination it shall appear to him that such convict is unable to pay such fine, or fine and costs, and that he has not any property exceeding $20 in value, except such as is by law exempt from being taken on execution for debt, the commissioner shall administer to him the following oath: 'I do solemnly swear that I have not any property, real or personal, to the amount of $20, except such as is by law exempt from being taken on civil process for debt by the laws of (naming the State where oath is administered); and that I have no property in any way conveyed or concealed, or in any way disposed of, for my future use or benefit. So help me God.' Upon taking such oath such convict shall be discharged; and the commissioner shall give to the keeper of the jail a certificate setting forth the facts. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

There being no objection the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

ASSISTANT SURGEONS FOR TEMPORARY SERVICE, NAVY MEDICAL CORPS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2284) to amend the act of May 4, 1898 (30 Stat. 369), so as to authorize the President to appoint 100 acting assistant surgeons for temporary service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and until I know something about the bill, I am constrained to object.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will read the report, I am sure he will get the information he desires. The purpose of the bill is to permit the President to appoint temporarily 100 positions in the Medical Corps of the Navy with the rank of junior lieutenant. They will be kept there a probationary period, approximately 18 months, and from them they will cull out the officers they need, to put into the permanent organization of the Medical Corps. It does not increase the Medical Corps at all. The Medical Corps is not being increased over the number permitted by law by doing this. It is a better method to obtain the personnel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of May 4, 1898, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes" (30 Stat. 369), is hereby amended so that the last paragraph of the appropriation for the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery (30 Stat. 380), to which provides as follows: "The President is hereby authorized to appoint for temporary service 25 acting assistant surgeons, who shall have the relative rank and compensation of assistant surgeons", shall read as follows: "The President is hereby authorized to appoint for temporary service 100 acting assistant surgeons, who shall have the rank and compensation of assistant surgeons."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT: Page 1, line 8, after the parenthesis, strike out the remainder of line 8; and strike out lines 9, 10, 11, and through the word "surgeons", line 1, page 2.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the purpose of that amendment is to make the bill show exactly what the amendment is?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is redundancy to begin with, and that we are adopting an entirely different policy in respect to the amendment of bills. I do not know of any bill which has ever been amended since I have been here wherein you set out the language of existing law, and then set out the new language. You amend the bill by amending the last paragraph of the bill, so that it shall read in a particular manner. I do not like to see a practice grow up on the floor here whereby we recite the language of existing law and then set forth the new language, because it is not only redundant, but it is very confusing to have the language of the old law set out in the new law, as it becomes a part of the law and to the person who reads as he runs, he might confuse the existing law with the new law.

It is hereby amended so that the last paragraph of the appropriation for the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, etc.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is right.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My point is that you set forth in the amendment the existing law and then you set forth entirely different language.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No doubt, when the bill was prepared by the Judge Advocate General's Office, they had that thought in mind to carry out in the bill the Ramseyer rule, which it does in the bill. This is a Senate bill that was sent up.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is nothing in the Ramseyer rule to indicate that existing law shall be set out in a new statute. Under the Ramseyer rule, it should be in the report.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I have no objection to it, provided it shows that the act is now being amended, which permits the President "is hereby authorized to appoint for temporary service 100 assistant acting surgeons."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not see how there could be any question as to what act or what paragraph is being amended. The bill is very clear and sets forth the new language. I think until the House, by rule, adopts a new policy with respect to the amendment of existing law we should adhere to the present practice, regardless of whether the Judge Advocate General wants it or not.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that since the gentleman has called attention to this law he will allow the bill to go through in its present phraseology, with the assurance that in the future any bills that have a bearing on this will be in accordance with his line of thought, because I do not want to have to go to conference on this bill. It may upset exactly what the bill wants in connection with it. By a hasty examination of the amendment, it might be prejudicial to the bill, and I trust the gentleman will let it go through this time, with the assurance that bills of this kind in the future will be in accordance with his line of thought.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say that the reason I offered this amendment is because I have noticed a tendency in bills which have been introduced, now being considered by committees, to change the established policy of the House in this respect. I think we should have it decided today as to whether we want to change a policy which has been in existence as long as this Congress, respecting amendments of acts. If there is any particular reason why this should be put in, and it goes to the Senate and they convince the gentleman, I am sure the House will accept the Senate amendment to that effect.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It does not go to the merits of the matter. It is a matter of form.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is perfectly innocuous.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. 662), insofar as the provisions thereof are embodied in section 908 of title 34 of the United States Code, is hereby amended to read as follows:

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

INVESTIGATION OF SUPPLY OF TIN

The Clerk called the next business, House Resolution 275.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like some information. A few years ago the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL] headed a committee to make a similar investigation.

Mr. BLOOM. That is right. I have discussed this resolution with the gentleman from Florida, who was the first to offer legislation of this kind, and upon whose resolution the original investigation of the committee was undertaken. I may say that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL] has advised me that he is in thorough accord with the purposes of the present resolution and feels that the investigation should be made.

Mr. COCHRAN. I understand the Army, the Navy, and the Department of Commerce have all the information that this resolution calls for.

Mr. BLOOM. No; they never did have the information until the Committee on Foreign Affairs investigated this matter and developed it for them, but that was 5 years ago. What we are trying to do now is bring the information down to date because the conditions and the situation existing throughout the world are entirely different from what existed in 1935. We made a thorough study and we recommended legislation that was passed, and it has done good work up to now; but in the last 5 years the situation has completely changed, and, as the gentleman knows, we must get most of our tin through England.

There is no one department or branch of the Government that can supply the Congress with complete information about the tin situation. Although the United States is wholly dependent upon foreign nations for its supply of tin, it consumes approximately one-half the world's production. Our normal consumption will run between 60,000 and 90,000 tons per year. In wartime this would be greatly increased. An average approximate peacetime price of tin is not far from $1,000 per ton, making our annual tin bill between $60,000,000 and $90,000,000.

The world production and price of tin are controlled by the International Tin Committee, officially representing the governments of the principal producing nations. The United States must, in effect, pay the price resulting from the committee's control. Frequently these prices bear no relation to the cost of tin production.

More than 4 years have elapsed since the former report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on tin. Our tin situation today is more precarious than ever before. During the past 4 years world conditions and world politics have undergone vital changes which affect unfavorably our already serious situation as regards tin.

Looked at from any point of view, it is high time that this situation was examined. I am not prepared to say whether the departments upon which, under existing law, devolves the duty of attempting to better our situation have done all that could have been done under the circumstances. That is a point which we might well look into also. However, it is not the main point. The outstanding and somewhat alarming fact is that the United States is today totally without any resources of this vital material, and, after more than 2 years of effort, has been unable to strengthen its position. In fact, its position is relatively much worse than it has even been before. It seems to me clearly a responsibility of Congress to act promptly in this matter. It is a problem which must be solved, and the former investigation carried out by the Committee on Foreign Affairs indicates that although difficult, it is by no means impossible of solution.

Aside from the primary consideration, which I have just mentioned, there are secondary aspects of this matter which are only relatively less grave. I refer to the recent action of the International Tin Committee in, without warning, drastically reducing tin quotas of the producing nations for the unquestioned purpose of making the United States pay millions of dollars of their war bills through an increase in the prices we have to pay them for tin. We have seen tin in this country at more than a dollar a pound, forced up by this same or similar agencies. An advance of only 10 cents per pound on the cost of tin we buy, will increase our annual tin bill by more than $20,000,000. There seems good reason to fear the possibility of advances far greater than this if the present war continues. I think it is worth spending a little time and four or five thousand dollars looking into this situation before it has cost us tens of millions.

There is also a very grave question of the continued exports from this country of both tin and tin-bearing scrap, the latter in the face of legislation which I believe the Congress intended to stop this practice.

The gentleman states that the Army, the Navy, and the Department of Commerce have all the information this resolution calls for. In fairness to those departments, I feel that I should say to the gentleman that they would be the first to admit that they cannot answer the primary questions toward which this resolution is directed, namely, where are we going to get our tin in sufficient quantities, and what are we going to do when we fail to get it?

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman tells me where we get the tin.

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Still the gentleman wants to know, through this resolution, where we are going to get the tin. He says he knows we are getting tin through England. If that is so, why investigate?

Mr. BLOOM. We do not know how we are going to get it and this investigation is to bring it down to date and find out what we are going to do in this country. We have in this country today only about a 2 weeks' supply of tin, if we cannot get any more. It is very important, both for national defense and for commercial purposes, that we should know something at this time and find out what is going to happen so far as the tin situation is concerned.

Mr. COCHRAN. How much is it going to cost?

Mr. BLOOM. It will not cost $5,000. The last time we received $10,000 and gave back a thousand dollars.

Mr. COCHRAN. I suggest that this go over for 2 weeks until I find out from the departments how much information they have on the subject. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this resoluiton may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]?

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the author of the resolution whether this carries an appropriation?

Mr. BLOOM. As I said to the gentleman from Missouri, it will cost from $3,000 to $5,000 to bring this investigation down to date.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, this is not a new question by any means. This matter has been investigated, investigated, and reinvestigated for a great many years. A few years ago this committee spent $10,000 in an investigation of this kind and it did not produce one iota more information than the Committee on Military Affairs produced in an investigation it made without spending a nickel. There are downtown any number of men connected with the Bureau of Mines and other departments who can tell the House of Representatives or anybody else in this country the exact situation with regard to tin all over the world and at any specific hour of the day.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. In just a minute. They can tell us anything we want to know. They can bring us up to date almost to the hour on the tin situation all over the world and so far as I am concerned I cannot see any use in any more furore about this matter. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. May I ask the gentleman from New York, is the statement true which appeared in the paper a short time ago that we exported some of our tin to foreign countries?

Mr. BLOOM. That is true.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Then it is high time to stop exporting tin when we produce only 1 percent of what we use.

Mr. BLOOM. We passed a resolution here several years ago prohibiting the exportation of tin-plate scrap.

Mr. FADDIS. I introduced that resolution myself.

Mr. BLOOM. I may say to the gentleman that for the benefit of our country, and for the benefit of our defenses, we should know what we are going to do with reference to tin. There has never been an investigation by the Congress with reference to the 21 States in the United States that contain tin. We have never tried to bring into this country tin ore for smelting here and I think that would be for the best interest of our country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]?

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2740, to amend section 9a, National Defense Act, as amended, so as to provide specific authority for the employment of warrant officers of the Regular Army as agents of officers of the finance department for the disbursement of public funds.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9a of the National Defense Act, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 766), be, and the same is hereby, further amended as follows:

After the word "officers", in line 13 of the said section, insert the words "or warrant officers"; before the word "to", in line 15, insert the words "or warrant officer."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENLISTMENT OF MEN UP TO 45 YEARS OF AGE IN TECHNICAL UNITS OF THE ENLISTED RESERVE CORPS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2769, to amend section 55, National Defense Act, as amended, to provide for enlistment of men up to 45 years of age in technical units of the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 55 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended (44 Stat. 704), be and the same is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 55. The Enlisted Reserve Corps: The Enlisted Reserve Corps shall consist of persons voluntarily enlisted therein. The period of enlistment shall be 3 years, except in the case of persons who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, who may be enlisted for 1-year periods and who in time of peace shall be entitled to discharge within 90 days if they make application therefor. Enlistments shall be limited to persons eligible for enlistment in the Regular Army who have had such military or technical training as may be prescribed by regulations of the Secretary of War, except that for original enlistments of such specialists in units as may be prescribed by regulations of the Secretary of War the maximum age shall be 45 years. All enlistments in force at the outbreak of war, or entered into during its continuation, whether in the Regular Army or the Enlisted Reserve Corps, shall continue in force until 6 months after its termination unless sooner terminated by the President."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTEREST RATE ON LAND BANK AND LAND BANK COMMISSIONER LOANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8450, to make permanent the reduced rates of interest on Federal land bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of the pending bill, H. R. 8450, which proposes to make permanent the reduced rates of interest on Federal land bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans at 3½ percent and 4 percent, respectively. I believe that this bill should pass. The interest rates specified in it are reasonable. They are neither unduly low nor unduly high. The rates are just because they are somewhat in line with those charged in other forms of business. Furthermore, these rates will help to stabilize agriculture, because borrowers will be better able to meet their obligations and escape inevitable foreclosures that dog the heels of unsuccessful business. There will be fewer tenant farmers in the future if present owners of farms can survive the difficult conditions which prevail in agriculture now.

Agriculture is a business in which the fixed expenses represent a large part of the cost of operation. Here are some of the fixed expenses: Interest on mortgages, taxes, insurance, freight rates, depreciation on buildings and machinery. These operating expenses accumulate day and night, whether crops are good or poor, whether prices of agricultural products are high or low. To be sure, lower interest rates will not solve the problems which confront agriculture today, but they will help to solve these problems, because, in many instances, the interest expense is a very large part of the total fixed expenses.

There are many farmers in my district, the Fourth District in Iowa, who are keenly interested in what this bill provides. On March 23, 1939, I introduced a bill, H. R. 5285, which proposes to achieve somewhat the same objectives as are sought in the bill which the Committee on Agriculture has seen fit to approve and which is before the House at the present moment. On March 24, 1939, I addressed the House in support of my bill.

Specifically my bill proposes that the interest rate on both types of loans be made permanent at a rate of 3½ percent, and it proposes further that the maturity period of the Land Bank Commissioner loans be made to extend over 34 years instead of the much shorter period which the law now prescribes.

I regret that the pending bill does not contain a provision for extending the period during which the Commissioner loans may be repaid. I trust that such a provision may be allowed in the form of an amendment to the pending bill. And I hope that there may be no objection to the pending bill when it comes before the House for action at some later date during the present session of the Congress.

The solution of our domestic problems should be our first order of business. Private property is the basic institution in our national economy. The pending bill seeks to preserve private property, and by preserving private property we support the entire economic structure of our Nation. Although this bill does not conform strictly to my own, I am for it, and urge its enactment at an early date.

NATURALIZATIONS OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6443, to permit certain aliens whose childhood was spent in the United States, if eligible to citizenship, to become naturalized without filing declaration of intention.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any alien who at the time of entering the United States is less than 16 years of age may upon attaining the age of 21 years, if eligible to citizenship, be naturalized upon full and complete compliance with all the requirements of the naturalization laws, subject to the following exceptions:

(a) No declaration of intention shall be required; and

(b) The petition for naturalization shall be filed within 1 year after such alien attains the age of 21 years.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act shall be construed as preventing its application to aliens who entered the United States prior to its enactment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This completes the call of the Consent Calendar.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8745) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate run throughout the day, the time to be equally divided and controlled by myself and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee.

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I trust that this motion will not be pressed this afternoon. As the program has been given out, this bill would come up for consideration in the first instance on tomorrow, and I have made that statement to a great many gentlemen. I thought that members of the committee had understood this, although I had not spoken to the gentleman from New York about it. However, I am committed to the statement that this bill will not come up until tomorrow, and I therefore trust that the gentleman will not press his motion.

The gentleman can have all the remainder of the week for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Permit the Chair to say to the gentleman from Texas that the Chair takes the responsibility for the misunderstanding with reference to the time the bill would be called up. The Chair was under the impression that the bill would be called up at the conclusion of the call of the Consent Calendar today, at the request of the subcommittee interested. The Chair regrets, of course, that he was misinformed. Of course, the gentleman from New York can withdraw his motion.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Then, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion and unanimous-consent request. I did not understand that that was the situation.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House heretofore entered, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] is recognized for 15 minutes.

POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I take this time this afternoon due to the fact that several days ago before the Joint Committee on Printing the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], who was desirous of having published a booklet regarding the rates of public utilities in the electrical business, made the statement that the Potomac Electric Power Co., of the city of Washington, was making 70 percent on the common stock. I said, "Mr. RANKIN, if the Potomac Electric Power Co. is making 70 percent on their capital investment, I will give you a new suit of clothes, because I do not believe any public utility in America is permitted to make a profit of that kind." I further made the statement that if they were making 70 percent on their capital invested, I would take the floor of the House and condemn them just the same as would the gentleman from Mississippi, for I would consider that a most unjust profit.

I probably would not have said anything further about that were it not for the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi rose on the floor of the House and said that he had lost a suit of clothes, that the Potomac Electric Power Co. were making only 60 percent. Therefore I have one of two courses to choose. It becomes my duty to defend the Potomac Electric Power Co. on the floor of the House of Representatives, or it becomes my duty to rise and say that they are highway robbers. I cannot do the latter; therefore, I am compelled to do the former.

May I say right here that I hold no stock in that company, and before that statement was made to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], I did not know anybody connected with it.

Let me say in the first place that after I went back to my office I wrote the Potomac Electric Power Co. asking for their financial statement. In return I received a reply from the president of the Potomac Electric Power Co., Mr. A. G. Neal, stating that he had filed with both the Speaker of the House and with the Vice President of the United States a copy of the annual report for 1939 and for previous years. When I went to the Speaker's office to get the copy of the report, I was informed that it was with the Committee on the District of Columbia. I went to that committee and got the statement that was filed by the president of the company, Mr. A. G. Neal, and which was sworn to before a notary public in the District of Columbia. It reads as follows:

I, A. G. Neal, president of the Potomac Electric Power Co., do hereby solemnly swear that the annexed statement is just and true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

I hold in my hand the statement that was filed with the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Then I tried to find out who this man, A. G. Neal, was, because I did not want to quote him on the floor of the House of Representatives unless he was a respectable and honest citizen. I got a report from the Library, quoting from Who's Who in the Nation's Capital, 1933–39, and also this additional report:

Alfred G. Neal, who has been acting president of the Potomac Electric Power Co. since William McClellan resigned to become president of the Union Electric Co., St. Louis, was elected president of the corporation by the board of directors last week in recognition of his long and efficient service.

Mr. Neal, who was born in Upper Marlboro, Md., in 1886, started with the company as assistant controller in February 1918, was elected vice president in January 1925, and made general manager in 1933. He has served on the board of directors of Potomac Electric Power Co. and Washington Railway & Electric Co. and held membership on the executive committee of Potomac Electric Power Co. since December 1934.

He worked his way up in the company and is now president and general manager, and he must be a good man or he would not hold both of those jobs with such a big concern.

Let me here insert other quotations about Mr. A. G. Neal:

Statement of Mr. Thomas L. Eagan, president of the Washington Rotary Club, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. Alfred Neal, in addition to being president of the Potomac Electric Power Co., has been closely identified with civic life in Washington for years. He is regarded as one of our outstanding citizens. He was chairman of the community service committee for the Washington Rotary Club last year—a committee that serves in the interest of boys' clubs of Washington and crippled children.

Another reputable source says:

Mr. Neal has been active in civic life for so many years that his name is known and respected throughout the community. He has done work amongst boys' clubs and for crippled children, in addition to other contributions too numerous and too well known to mention.

Mr. Lawrence E. Williams, president of the Washington Board of Trade, states:

The greater part of his entire business career has been with the general field of public utilities. Mr. Neal has been a resident of the District since 1917 and has for many years been one of Washington's most prominent citizens. He has long been interested in civic affairs. He has been a member of the Washington Board of Trade for 10 years, serving on its committees on charities and corrections, industrial interests, municipal finance, and public utilities. He is an active member of the Rotary Club and a trustee of the Community Chest.

He is regarded as a man of splendid character, exceptional ability, and excellent citizenship.

I have several other recommendations showing that this man is a man of unimpeachable character and outstanding ability.

Now, what is the situation insofar as the Potomac Electric Power Co. and its operations are concerned?

First, I may state that the capital stock as revealed in this statement is 130,000 shares at par of $100, and it has common stock of $6,000,000; preferred capital stock, 6 percent, series 25, $2,000,000; preferred capital stock, 5½ percent, series 27, $5,000,000; making a total of $13,000,000 capital.

It has long-term or first-mortgage debts, 3¼ percent, due 1966, of $20,000,000. It has first-mortgage bonds of 3¼ percent, due 1974, of $5,000,000; a total of $25,000,000 of bonds outstanding.

It has earned surplus of $31,157,058.16.

This report gives a list of the stockholders. I counted the pages and there are 75 pages with 55 names on the page, which would mean over 4,000 stockholders. Many of them are banks in the city that are trustees for estates.

There is $7,000,000 preferred stock. Amount necessary for dividend on preferred stock annually is $395,037.42.

The conservative practice of this corporation for years back has been to pay out nominal dividends to the stockholders and then the balance went back into the surplus fund, which they used for improvements.

Now, what did this company do last year? It manufactured 1,103,819,809 kilowatt-hours of electricity. It used 510,891 tons of coal, and the cost of the coal was $2,619,723.12. This not only gave work to the people in the District, but it gave work to the miners back in the States who mined the coal, and also gave work to the railroad employees who transported the coal here to the District of Columbia.

They made improvements to plant and equipment in 1939, as the report will show, in the production plant of over $117,110.51; transmission plant, $256,465.57 more; in the distribution plant of $4,005,143.08; and in the general plant of $195,230.92. They have construction work in progress amounting to over $800,000. In other words, the actual improvements they made to their facilities last year amounted to $4,454,340.10.

The amount spent for labor by this corporation last year was $5,061,274.44.

The assets of the company, as shown by this report, are $89,236,023.

The Commission of the District of Columbia, a body which is made up to audit the books of this company and to state on what grounds they can base their capitalization in order that they may charge proper rates, has put that figure at $80,974,758.

On this valuation last year, 1939, they earned $4,230,271.33, or for the common stock and surplus—money invested—they earned 7.39 percent. Seven and thirty-nine hundreds percent on their capital invested, and when they have earned this amount after putting their surplus back into the company, is that, I ask you, an unjust earning for any corporation that takes the chances and the responsibilities that a public utility has to take?

Now, for taxes in 1939 they paid out $2,225,635.83, or 53 percent of the net earnings.

Some taxes the Government and District get for the privilege of a corporation doing business. A real asset to the District and to the United States. If it were like the T. V. A. what taxes would it pay? What taxes do Government corporations or business pay? I'll say none; they are a liability instead of an asset. The number of customers is 197,232. The taxes paid for each customer amounts to $11.28 per year, or 94 cents for each customer per month in tax. Who pays the tax, I ask?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I am afraid that my time will go before I can get in what I want to say. The gentleman has 20 minutes following me, and I am afraid that I will not have time to get all of this into the RECORD.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, I will get the gentleman additional time.

Mr. RICH. Will I get my time from the gentleman?

Mr. RANKIN. No, from the House.

Mr. RICH. I want to get all of this into the RECORD. I want to make a complete statement.

Mr. RANKIN. When the gentleman comes to account for taxes, he is counting in the income taxes.

Mr. RICH. Well, taxes are taxes, and call them any name you want to. You have to pay them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield for 1 minute of time, and that is all.

Mr. RANKIN. I just want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that when he gets to counting the taxes, he is counting in the income taxes, the taxes on these enormous incomes—the taxes on these enormous incomes that these utilities and power companies make.

Mr. RICH. Oh, the gentleman said it right the first time—enormous income taxes. Their total income was $4,230,271.33. The gentleman will not dispute that, will he?

Mr. RANKIN. How is that?

Mr. RICH. The gentleman will not dispute the fact that their income was $4,230,271.33?

Mr. RANKIN. I shall answer that in my own time.

Mr. RICH. Naturally big corporations have to pay a big tax. They pay now 18½ percent of their income, first crack out of the box, and the more they make, the more they have to pay, naturally. I want to show what this corporation has done in the reduction of rates since 1925. They have reduced their rates according to reports given here by $762,332, and in 1926 by $552,164, and in 1934 by $379,841. I can ask unanimous consent to have this table inserted in the RECORD, because I do not want to read each one of these years. A fine table of progress in rate reduction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO.

MEMORANDA

Amount absorbed by rate reduction

Year in which rate reduction was made:
1925	$762,352
1926	352,164
1927	430,829
1928	337,895
1929	624,062
1930	660,035
1931	830,463
1932	861,023
1933	563,335
1934	379,841
1935	147,821
1936	310,117
1937	504,682
1938	770,325
1939	393,986
1940	575,297

The average rate paid by residential customers in 1924, just prior to the inauguration of the consent-decree, sliding-scale plan, was very close to 10 cents per kilowatt-hour. The precise figure is not available as the same rate schedule was available until 1926 for both residential and small commercial customers. The average rate in 1926 was 6.73 cents after two rate reductions. In 1939 it was 2.61 cents. It is quite possible that the average rate for 1940 will drop to 2.5 cents, about a quarter of what it was in 1924.

Residential rates

1924

First 120 hours' use of the connected load	cents per kilowatt-hour	10
Excess	do	5.225
Minimum charge		$1.00

1940

First 40 kilowatt-hours	cents per kilowatt-hour	3.9
Next 90 kilowatt-hours	do	1.75
Excess	do	1.5
Minimum charge		$0.75

Mr. RICH. In the year 1940 they reduced the rates by $575,297. The residential rates in 1924 are listed here as well as in 1940.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman read those residential rates for 1924?

Mr. RICH. In 1924, 10 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. RANKIN. That was before the T. V. A. was created.

Mr. RICH. The rates are on the above-mentioned table, and I insert later the rates at Tupelo, Miss.

Mr. RANKIN. The first 50 kilowatt-hours in Tupelo costs only $1.25.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman from Mississippi any longer at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RICH. I shall put it into the RECORD showing the residential rates in Tupelo, Miss., and in Sheffield, Ala. Then I will show the rates in Washington, D. C., and show that after you use 150 kilowatt-hours the rate in Washington, D. C., is cheaper than it is in Tupelo, Miss.

Residential rates

TUPELO, MISS.

First 50 kilowatt-hours	cents per kilowatt-hour	3.00
Next 150 kilowatt-hours	do	2.00
Next 200 kilowatt-hours	do	1.00
Excess of 400 kilowatt-hours	do	.40

SHEFFIELD, ALA.

Same as Tupelo, Miss., except .4 cent block is 1,000 kilowatt-hours and excess over 1,400 is at .75 cent.

Comparative bills at Washington and Tupelo rates

	Washington	Tupelo
50 kilowatt-hours	$1.74	$1.50
100 kilowatt-hours	2.61	2.50
150 kilowatt-hours	3.44	3.50
200 kilowatt-hours	4.19	4.50
250 kilowatt-hours	4.94	5.00

One great advantage that the rates in Tupelo, Miss., have over the Potomac Electric Power Co., or any other electric power company, is the fact that the W. P. A. using Government money have gone down into Tupelo and all these southern cities served by T. V. A. and have given them grants of 45 percent or an outright gift to help them electrify their towns and local communities. Then the communities went out to the Public Works Administration and borrowed the other 55 percent, having the Government do all the work and furnish all the money.

Now no such grants or gifts were given the people of Washington, nor was the Potomac Electric Power Co. aided in any way in Government subsidies. No wonder the people down south are "hollering" for the T. V. A., a Government-owned and controlled electric plant furnished by the taxpayers back in Pennsylvania and all the other States, and those fellows down there are getting the gravy. Why, it is just outlandish to think that anything like that should happen in civilized America, unless you are a communistic or Russianized form of government. And God forbid that we in America go any further with such New Deal organizations and agencies as is suggested by some of the Members of Congress. What is going to happen to us when we have a dictatorship at the head of our Government and everything Russianized? We will have no need for a Congress, the dictators will run this Government, and that is about where we are headed now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will stay here, because I have some figures on Williamsport, Pa.

Mr. RICH. Do not worry. I will not run away.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. And I say this, Mr. Speaker: If the gentleman from Mississippi has made his statement as wild about the electric rates in Williamsport, Pa., as he has about the rates of the Potomac Electric Power Co. here in Washington, I know I shall have no confidence in them, and yet I want to say here that I believe the gentleman from Mississippi, JOHN RANKIN, is an honest man. I do not believe there is a crooked hair in his head, but I think he is obsessed with the idea that everybody in the utility business, and every businessman is a crook. I say that I am a businessman, and I glory in that fact, and I am not going to put my head under a table or under a bushel for the gentleman from Mississippi, JOHN RANKIN, or for anybody else. I am not ashamed of it. I am mighty proud that I am, and I have not gone in bankruptcy or been arrested for being dishonest.

The value of the Potomac Electric Power Co., $6,000,000 of stock for 1925 to 1935, shows dividends that they paid on their capital invested from 6.78 percent in 1925 to 7.12 percent in 1935; 1939, 10.50. That is when we had the undistributed-profits tax, and they were compelled then by a law that was unjust to pay out their money or else pay an exorbitant income tax on undistributed profits. Then they had nothing to go ahead and make improvements with because they tried to save taxes; that was honest and just. In fact, it was what the tax wanted corporations to do. That is what this company has been doing ever since 1925—improve their service and reduce rates. The reports will show that.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to put these charts that I have read into the RECORD, as well as an article on The Utilities Offer the Facts, by C. W. Kellogg, and it deals with the Tennessee Valley Authority, showing the rates that the public utilities pay and what the Tennessee Valley Authority charges.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman will let the RECORD show that Mr. Kellogg is employed by the Power Trust, will he?

Mr. RICH. I do not know. As long as he is honest I do not care who employs him. We are after facts; not trying to injure and destroy anyone.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Speaking of the electric companies in Pennsylvania, I know Mr. John Wise, president; Mr. Lon Heath, vice president; Mr. Earl Mench, district manager; and Mr. McIntire, district manager, of Pennsylvania Power and Light Co., and they are honest, capable people, and anything you say regarding their company will have no effect on their standing in society for everybody knows them to be fine, honest businessmen.

Now, I will say to my colleague from Mississippi that he should read these reports I insert in the RECORD tomorrow, because I do not have time to read them into the RECORD now. The gentleman has made a statement about this Potomac Electric Power Co. receiving 60 or 70 percent profit on their common capital stock. He knows that all during the years they have been in operation, since 1925, they have put in their money, over and above nominal dividends, into surplus for improvements and benefits to their patrons. They have accumulated that surplus, and that is just like that much capital. It should be, because if they did not invest that in improvements they would have to go out and sell different kinds of debentures or stocks in order to get capital to make these improvements.

So I ask you, in the name of good business, what is the difference whether a corporation puts its surplus back into the corporation or whether it goes out and sells additional stock? It is all the same to the consumer. It requires the same amount of money. It is the only just thing to do. It is sound, sensible business, and honest and conservative management.

I will say that for the Potomac Electric Power Co., as far as I understand this statement, and I have gone over it, I think they are doing a good job in the District of Columbia. They are reducing their rates annually. They are trying to give service to the people of the District of Columbia. I am glad I did not have to stand here today and give them any condemnation, because I think they are conservative, legitimate, honest business people, and they have a good organization. They are not trying to hoodwink anybody. They are not trying to gouge anybody. It is all an open book, because they are compelled by the law of the District of Columbia to furnish the Speaker of the House and the Vice President a copy of their report. I return this report of Potomac Electric Power Co. now to the "mayor" of the District of Columbia, the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. JENNINGS RANDOLPH. [Applause and laughter.]

THE UTILITIES OFFER THE FACTS—WITH THE CLOUDS OF A NEW GOVERNMENT DRIVE AGAINST THE UTILITIES NOW GATHERING, THIS REFUTATION OF THE NEW ACCUSATIONS IS TIMELY, IMPORTANT, AND WORTH FILING FOR FUTURE REFERENCE

(By C. W. Kellogg, President, Edison Electric Institute)

The recent renewal by Federal Government officials of attacks on the electric utility industry makes it desirable to examine factually the charges that have been made against the utilities.

This paper will be addressed particularly to the statement of Congressman JOHN E. RANKIN, of Tupelo, Miss., in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for October 23, 1939. The gist of his statement is that based on T. V. A. rates, the national power bill represented in 1938 an overcharge of $889,000,000; based on rates in Tacoma, Wash., the annual overcharge was $1,130,000,000; and based on Ontario, Canada, rates, $1,007,000,000. Mr. RANKIN charges also that the utilities are greatly overcapitalized.

The figures in the tables he presents to substantiate the claimed "overcharges" reveal many inaccuracies, but my purpose is to discuss only the general considerations involved.

To be fair, comparisons must be between subjects where conditions are approximately similar. For example, a comparison of crop yields to be fair should be under similar conditions of soil, rainfall, and climate; and it is common experience that a few high spots are no fair measure of average conditions.

Let us apply this test in turn to each of the three situations Mr. RANKIN has used as a measuring stick for the whole Nation.

1. The T. V. A. power system is the product of large appropriations from the Federal Treasury. It has charged off half of its expenditures to other than power purposes. It pays no interest. It has set aside a ridiculously small amount for depreciation. It pays a tax which is only a small fraction of the rate of taxation of private utilities and it has received without charge substantial aid from other Government agencies. Many of the municipalities taking power from its system have obtained their distribution systems through the intermediary of the T. V. A. at prices far below cost. Others have received P. W. A. grants at 45 percent of the cost, with the remainder of the money lent at a low rate of interest.

It ought to be clear that, with the above set of facts, it is most unfair to denounce as "overcharges" the difference between what publicly regulated, privately financed enterprises, in order to recoup their costs, have to charge for service and what a heavily subsidized Government project elects to charge. In fact, if the T. V. A. program and method were used to duplicate the power facilities of the entire Nation, the total yearly cost to the taxpayer would be so staggering as far to outweigh the so-called overcharge of $889,000,000.

2. Tacoma is another special case. It has very cheap water-power sources near at hand. Fuel prices have been such as to encourage domestic use of electricity. For over 40 years it has been a municipal plant, during which period the tax exemption alone (assumed by the taxpayer) could have more than paid off the entire plant investment. The fact is that taxes plus electricity cost more in Tacoma than in its neighboring city in the same State, Spokane. Here is a comparison where conditions are relatively similar, the chief difference being that the Spokane utility is privately owned and operated.

The average annual use of electricity in the home in 1938 was 2,104 kilowatt-hours in Spokane and 1,804 kilowatt-hours in Tacoma. The average residence rate per kilowatt-hour was in Spokane, 2.08 cents; in Tacoma, 1.56 cents.

This apparently favorable layout for the Tacoma householder is, however, destroyed and reversed by the relative tax picture. The tax rate in 1938 for the two cities was: Spokane, $45.30; Tacoma, $57—a difference of $11.70 a thousand in favor of Spokane. For a modest dwelling, assessed at $3,000, this difference becomes $35.10—an amount which figures out to 1.95 cents for each of the 1,804 kilowatt-hours used by the average Tacoma home.

WHAT COUNTS IS MONEY SPENT

So, with taxes equalized, the resident of such a home in municipal Tacoma pays over half as much again for the same amount of electricity as does the corresponding resident of private Spokane. This is a more revealing comparison, because it is the actual money spent by the citizen that really counts with him, whether he pays it out for taxes or for electricity.

3. The third measuring stick used by Mr. RANKIN is Ontario. Ontario is principally supplied by Niagara Falls as a source for power generation, but other cheap water powers are available. Its power system is tax exempt. It does not have as high standards of construction as are required of electric utilities in the United States. No coal is mined in Ontario and supplies of oil and gas are limited, which gives electricity a competitive advantage.

Although electricity has heretofore enjoyed tax exemption, the combined tax and electric bill of the average householder in Toronto, for instance, is higher than the combined tax and electric bill of the average householder in the neighboring city of Buffalo. Similarly, the combined tax and electric bill of the average householder of Windsor, Ontario, is higher than the combined tax and electric bill of the average householder in Detroit, across the river. What has been gained in cutting the price of electricity has been more than offset by rising taxes over a period of years. (The new war tax against public power has greatly disturbed the public power officials in Canada. Its effect on their rate structure has not yet been determined.)

The average rates of municipal plants in the United States are about on a parity with those of private plants, as the summary of the January 1, 1939, rate survey of the Federal Power Commission shows. The table compares average monthly bills in different consumption groups as of that date.

100 kilowatt-hours	4.85	4.76
250 kilowatt-hours	8.97	8.25
500 kilowatt-hours	14.98	11.64

This is an arithmetic average. The weighted average is somewhat favorable to the municipal plants on account of the dominating influence of the three large west coast municipal systems with below-average rates. But, with the correction for tax exemption, the comparison is decidedly in favor of private companies.

Another way to appraise Mr. RANKIN's alleged overcharge of $889,000,000 in the national electric bill is to consider just what that electric bill has to pay for.

The gross operating revenues of the electric utilities of the United States for 1937 were $2,207,000,000. Total operating and maintenance expenses, together with taxes and retirement and other reserves, required $1,551,000,000, leaving $656,000,000 that was paid to bond- and stock-holders—an average rate of 5½ percent on the $12,000,000,000 invested in plant.

The alleged overcharge would wipe out any return to the millions of investors who put part or all of their life savings into this great amount of capital, and it would still leave $233,000,000 to come from elsewhere.

Presumably, this would have to come out of the $451,000,000 paid in wages to employees—about a 50-percent cut. It could not be taken out of taxes, or out of the cost of coal or other materials; nor could it be taken from the retirement and reserve allowances without seriously impairing the standards of service which the public properly demands of private enterprise, as the electric utilities have no national treasury to draw upon.

AVERAGED $122 PER HORSEPOWER AGAINST $286

As to Mr. RANKIN's assertion that the plant investment claimed by the electric utilities is greatly inflated, the Government's own experience in the past 6 years has tended to confirm the validity of the private companies' investments in similar property.

The table which appears on page 17 compares the cost reported to the Federal Power Commission of six dams built in recent years in the East and Southeast under Federal license by private companies, with the estimated or actual cost of six dams on the Tennessee River as part of the T. V. A. system built by the Government. The initial cost (with 64 percent of ultimate capacity installed) averaged $122 per horsepower for the six private plants. For the six Government plants (with 47 percent of ultimate capacity installed), it averaged $286.

Five of the six dams on the Tennessee River have or will have navigation locks while the six private plants have none. But the resulting difference in cost of 5 or 6 percent does not materially affect the comparison.

According to a W. P. A. survey, the electric bill of the average workman amounts to 1.5 percent of his cost of living. According to other Government surveys, the electric bill amounts to about 1.3 percent of the value of product in the average manufacturing business. If, through Federal subsidy, the price of electricity were cut one-third, this would amount to only one-half of 1 percent of the cost of living for the householder and of the value of product for the manufacturer. On the other hand, the share of the average family in the cost of government is now about $516 per annum, or 44 percent of the average worker's annual income.

LOW-COST CURRENT ISN'T ALL

Using public funds to subsidize the cost of electricity has not proved a long-range advantage. Although Ontario has long enjoyed low-cost electricity, business development in the bordering areas of western New York and Michigan has far outstripped the growth in Ontario, and wages on the American side compared with those on the Ontario side quite overshadow the small factor of electric rates.

Cheap electricity has proved a relatively unimportant factor in the growth and development of Tacoma, which has been outstripped by Seattle to the north and Portland to the south with higher prices for electricity. Similarly, in Mr. RANKIN's own Tupelo, Miss., the first community to take T. V. A. power, there has been no influx or development by reason of cheap electricity. In fact, two mills have gone out of business—not, of course, because of cheap electricity but because cheap electricity proved to be no important consideration.

In the end, though, the issue of private enterprise versus public ownership is far greater than the mere question of the price of electricity.

Economic well-being has always advanced where private enterprise has been given fair play to exert its initiative, resource, and industry. Low taxes, resulting from wise and efficient handling of necessary functions of government and from leaving to private enterprise the business it can perform, far outweigh the influence of electric rates. Larger earnings with which to pay living and business costs have been much more important to any people than subsidized electric rates.

ANSWERING MR. RICH—POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO. DID MAKE 64 PERCENT ON COMMON STOCK LAST YEAR—ELECTRIC RATES AND OVERCHARGES IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has just given us an amusing performance in his attempt to answer my statement concerning the Potomac Electric Power Co. and its earnings on its common stock. In his speech he went out of his way to attack the T. V. A., and to make statements about the city of Tupelo, Miss., my home town, that are so far from the facts that I cannot let them go unchallenged.

It seems to me that he has permitted these utility propagandists to take him for a "snipe hunt" and leave him to hold the bag. His childish handling of this question makes one think of Innocents Abroad.

The conscientious gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] might well say to these utilities, in the words of Holy Writ, "I came to you a stranger and ye took me in." His speech was so weak that I at first thought he wrote it himself, but when he wound up by reading into the RECORD the attack on me by C. W. Kellog, the chief propagandist for the Power Trust—which statement is literally teeming with false and misleading statements—and when I ran hurriedly over his remarks, knowing that the conscientious gentleman from Pennsylvania would not intentionally make a misstatement, it occurred to me that his speech might be characterized as "the hand of Esau and the voice of Jacob."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he has no prejudice on this subject. He should not have, for prejudice presupposes knowledge, and he showed such a pathetic lack of knowledge of this subject that it should clear him of any charges of personal prejudice.

I make this statement in justice to him because when the people up in Pennsylvania whom he represents, or whom he is supposed to represent, finally realize how they are being robbed and plundered in electric light and power rates, I want them to know that we here who know and love the gentleman from Pennsylvania, understand thoroughly that his attitude on this subject is prompted by an error of the head and not of the heart. He just does not know any better. He is one of the innocent victims himself. The Power Trust is robbing him and the enterprises he is connected with in the most ruthless manner, just as they are the rest of the people of Pennsylvania, as I will show before I conclude.

I am glad he has begun to study this question, even though he is in the kindergarten stage of it. When he gets a little more information on the subject, he will probably ask to have these remarks of his struck from the RECORD.

The first thing I want to do is to teach him to read a meter. I brought these meters in here the other day, placed the old one with four dials before him, and challenged him to read it. I placed it on a table out in the hall and a little later I saw the gentleman from Pennsylvania attempting to read it. He fumbled worse than the proverbial nearsighted farmer on the dial phone. If he cannot read the meter, and is so easily misled by this Power Trust propaganda, which he has just read into the RECORD, how in the world does he expect his constituents to protect themselves against the exorbitant rates they are now paying for electricity?

When I saw him vainly attempt to read this old meter, and then heard his speech, I thought of a Negro down at home who tried to tell the time of day by the dial on the gas tank at the filling station. Some country Negroes had come to town and wandered up and down the streets till they got hungry. They asked another Negro to find out the time of day for them. He saw this dial on the gas tank and thought it was the town clock. He gazed at it for a minute and said, "Well, de bes' I kin tell, hits jes' about 15 minutes after haf pas' a quarter 'fo leben o'clock; but if any de res' of you all wants to know what time it is while you is in town, ef I ain't along, I spec you better jes' look at de sun." [Laughter.]

In order to assist him in every possible way I am going to show how they are robbed and plundered in light and power rates in his district before I close, but I first want to answer the misleading statements and erroneous conclusions arrived at by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. He really answered himself when he showed that there are only $6,000,000 of common stock of the Potomac Electric Co., and, to quote his own words, "they earned $4,230,271.33, or for the common stock and surplus," and so on.

Who got that surplus? Why it went to these common-stock holders, of course. It did not go to the bondholders; it did not go to the preferred-stock holders—it went to these common-stock holders who own this $6,000,000 of common stock, and I believe any school boy in Pennsylvania can show that it amounted to more than 64 percent, which I said these common-stock holders were earning.

In other words, they simply take their overcharges, which they wring from the ultimate consumers in the District of Columbia by exorbitant rates, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just showed ran as high as 10 cents a kilowatt-hour before the T. V. A. was created and its yardstick rates promulgated, showing the American people what electricity is really worth—they simply take these overcharges, call them "surplus," reinvest them in additional facilities on which to overcharge additional consumers, and try to hide the fact that they are making from 60 to 75 percent annually on their common stock.

But the people of the District of Columbia are helpless; they must look to Congress for protection. Instead of giving them this pitiful reduction of $525,297 in their light and power rates for the coming year, they should have been given a reduction of at least $3,000,000.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one-half minute?

Mr. RANKIN. Not just now. Now let us see who owns this Potomac Electric Co. A holding company, this Washington Railroad & Electric Co., owns 100 percent of its common stock. That company is owned or controlled by the North American Co., which in turn is owned or controlled by another holding company, the Central States Electric Co., which is owned by Harrison Williams, the multimillionaire who has become rich through these overcharges, and who is often referred to by the press as the "owner of the world's largest yacht."

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; not yet.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it bigger than Vincent Astor's yacht?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know the exact size of it, but I will show before I conclude that the constituents of the gentleman from Wisconsin are helping to pay for this yacht in overcharges for their electric lights and power, and that he is doing nothing to protect them. Remember the people of Wisconsin are overcharged $20,000,000 a year for electric lights and power.

This North American Co. owns and controls other companies that are served by the people of Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Ohio, Missouri, and some States in the far West. When I say that these companies are "served by the people" in those States, I mean just that.

The record shows that the people of Michigan paid an overcharge for electric lights and power in 1938, amounting to $40,030,420, according to the T. V. A. rates, and $47,000,000, according to the Ontario rates; the people of Wisconsin paid overcharges during that year amounting to $20,858,242, according to the T. V. A. rates; the people of Illinois, $69,915,257; Iowa, $14,461,697; Kansas, $10,774,695; Ohio, $47,871,987; Missouri, $21,005,411; Pennsylvania, $72,513,570; Alabama, $7,300,505; Arizona, $4,319,264; Arkansas, $5,681,543; California, $32,942,007; Colorado, $8,532,935; Connecticut, $17,605,938; Delaware, $2,005,452; District of Columbia, $3,025,477; Florida, $15,496,148; Georgia, $11,026,411; Idaho, $3,497,009; Indiana, $24,110,278; Kentucky, $8,904,411; Louisiana, $9,463,871; Maine, $6,278,767; Maryland, $13,191,408; Massachusetts, $44,487,091; Minnesota, $16,432,306; Mississippi, $4,649,439; Montana, $4,115,411; Nebraska, $7,099,169; Nevada, $941,585; New Hampshire, $4,557,821; New Jersey, $48,077,342; New Mexico, $2,172,940; New York, $157,872,433; North Carolina, $11,582,712; North Dakota, $2,737,207; Oklahoma, $11,452,668; Oregon, $6,414,474; Pennsylvania, $72,513,570, as I have just stated; Rhode Island, $7,535,927; South Carolina, $5,719,937; South Dakota, $3,331,189; Tennessee, $7,274,287; Texas, $31,096,962; Utah, $4,427,614; Vermont, $2,791,629; Virginia, $11,010,583; Washington, $10,492,265; West Virginia, $10,117,190; Wyoming, $2,088,863.

The rates in every one of these States could be reduced so as to wipe out these enormous overcharges, and still afford ample returns on all legitimate investments. These are the tributes the people of the various States are paying to these utilities, including these vast holding companies, stacked, as I have said, three or four deep upon the top of one subsidiary or operating company, and reaching down through that maze, or network, of corporate entanglements and sucking the economic lifeblood from the ultimate consumers of electric lights and power, and paying to a few useless officials salaries so large that they were denounced by the President of the United States as "thievery within the law." No wonder they can pay large income taxes out of these exorbitant rates they are wringing from the helpless consumers.

This holding company that owns or controls the Potomac Electric Co. also owns the Union Electric Co. of Missouri. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers cumulative evidence, or statements, to show that Mr. A. G. Neal, president of the Potomac Electric Co., who made this affidavit which he inserted in the RECORD, is an honorable man, and one of these statements shows that Mr. Neal succeeded Mr. William McClellan, who recently resigned to become president of the Union Electric Co. in St. Louis. As a matter of fact, the Union Electric Co. and the Potomac Elecrtic Co., as I have shown, are owned by the same outfit, and they rushed Mr. McClellan out to St. Louis to try to stave off the catastrophe which the sins of that outfit have produced.

If the conscientious gentleman from Pennsylvania had looked a little further into this great mesh of holding-company entanglements, he would have known that they are all a part of the same system, and he would have found that the officials of the Union Electric Co. are now under indictment for corruption, perjury, and falsifying the records to cover up the funds used to bribe officials.

I wonder how much of these funds that are wrung from the helpless consumers of electricity in the District of Columbia will now go to keep these officials out of jail in St. Louis.

Mr. RICH. Is the gentleman talking about the Potomac Electric Power Co., or whom is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. RANKIN. I am trying to show the gentleman from Pennsylvania whom he has been talking for. I am talking about the crowd that owns and controls the Potomac Electric Co.

Mr. RICH. Do not let the impression go out that they are officials of the Potomac Electric Power Co.

Mr. RANKIN. Why not? Why not let the people know that they own and control the Potomac Electric Power Co.? I have shown that there are three or four holding companies piled up on top of the people of the District of Columbia siphoning money out of their pockets, just as there are in Pennsylvania, siphoning money in overcharges out of the pockets of every human being in the gentleman's district who turns an electric switch, except perhaps the few of them who are served by municipal plants.

Mr. RICH. Then the gentleman means to say that the officials of every municipal electric company or public utility are crooks and scoundrels. Is that the gentleman's interpretation?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly not.

Mr. RICH. That is what the gentleman said.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, not at all. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not understand language any better than that, he ought not to get mixed up in a controversy of this kind.

Mr. RICH. That is the same information the gentleman gave me. If I did not know anything more about some of these things than the gentleman does I would take a college education and find out.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania needs some kindergarten education. He could not even read the meter I brought in here.

Mr. RICH. I could read that meter or any other meter ever made. The gentleman knows it, and so do I. Why he makes such a statement I cannot understand.

Mr. RANKIN. Here is the meter now with its four dials; I will yield for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to read it. He cannot tell me now what the reading of this meter is. He will not try to read it; he will not dare try. He can read this other one-dial meter, which is now being put on the market for about half the price of the old one, as result of my efforts, and which any farmer boy in Pennsylvania or Mississippi can read.

As I pointed out the other day, these old four-dial meters, with two dials running clockwise and two counterclockwise, are obsolete, and so complicated that the average man who pays an electric bill cannot even read one of them. When I found out they had this new one-dial meter in Canada, I set to work to get it manufactured in this country; and I succeeded.

The R. E. A. is now supplying these meters to the people on their rural lines at less than half the price they paid for the old ones; and, as I pointed out, if every residential consumer in the United States had to buy a new meter now they would save over $100,000,000 on them.

Instead of trying to educate the gentleman from Pennsylvania to read this old, complicated meter, this old four-dial concern, I want to urge him to get one of these new ones that he can read without further training and that every consumer in his district can read.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] missed the point in my previous remarks, and therefore did not meet the issues I raised. I showed that the Potomac Electric Power Co. was earning an excessive return on the actual stated balance sheet investment in common stock, amounting last year to 64 percent—see page 58, 1938 Annual Report of the Public Utility Commission of the District of Columbia. And if the returns coincided with the true legal and historical concept of the sliding-scale plan of rates and dividends, the electric consumers of Washington would be purchasing electricity at the T. V. A. yardstick rates or less, or something like 30 or 40 percent below the present rates, and they would have received a rate reduction of about $3,000,000 a year instead of $525,000.

The T. V. A. yardstick rates could be put into effect here in Washington without any destruction of legitimate investments or credits. Then everyone could cook and heat their house with electricity, as they will be doing sooner or later.

The third column of the gentleman's table is erroneous, as it does not set out all the net earnings. He left out of consideration all earnings retained in the bank at the end of the year over the actual payment to the common shareholder, or funds invested in plant or equipment.

The equity figures in the second column of his table were started in 1925 on a $7,500,000 to $10,000,000 advance in value without actual investment. Their capital structure was simply watered that amount. Some authorities state the initial write-up was $7,500,000; others say it was $10,000,000. I have pointed out how this water got into the balance sheet. The people of Washington have been paying rates on it ever since. If he wants an independent verification of the facts, he can find it on pages 261 and 262 of Bauer's Electric Power Industry, published by Harper & Bros. in 1939. I would refer him also to the study of the sliding scale published by the Columbia University Press in 1936, pages 154 and 157. Both publications can be secured from the Congressional Library. In the Columbia University publication, column 6, he will find a verification of my tables for the years 1925 and 1933. The publication, for example, showed in the year 1930 the common stock earned 68 percent. The gentleman ignored the division of the $6,000,000 impounded fund, which under a court order belonged to the rate payers.

Again his equity value ignores depreciation, as it was actually derived from an undepreciated rate base. There is no law or decision that allows an undepreciated rate base. It is contrary to all the natural laws ordained by the Creator. He has also gone astray as to the stock ownership. For information on that point, he should consult the declaration filed by the company with the S. E. C. Likewise, he will find by asking the Utility Commission for a break-down of taxes paid, that the local company has been paying ridiculously low local taxes when compared to gross earnings.

The latest record I have before me on that point is for 1937, the year the Potomac Electric Co. earned 74 percent on its common stock. The taxes for that year on the property of this concern in both Maryland and the District of Columbia, including the Federal tax on electricity, amounted to only 6.8 percent on its gross earnings. Of course, this does not include the income taxes paid by the higher-ups in this combination on their enormous incomes; nor does it include the taxes on Mr. Harrison's yacht.

This is a lower percentage than the municipal plant at Tupelo, Miss., pays in taxes out of its gross revenues.

For the information of the House, here is the table showing the earnings of this Potomac Electric Co., both before and after the consent decree, as shown by the records of the Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

I do not see how the conscientious gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] even could understand it.

Earning data secured from Public Utility Commission of the District of Columbia

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman talks about this rate base and refers to it as being $80,000,000 or $89,000,000, when the record shows that there are only $25,000,000 in bonds, $7,000,000 in preferred stocks, and $6,000,000 common stocks, amounting in all to $38,000,000, as shown by the record; and that after paying the interest on the bonds and preferred stocks it left 64 percent for the holders of the common stocks.

I do not know who wrote that stuff the gentleman from Pennsylvania read, showing that 50 kilowatt-hours a month in Tupelo, Miss., costs a domestic consumer $3, when in fact it costs him only $1.25. In his district in Pennsylvania it would cost $3.12, although the power company that operates in that area can generate its own power with Pennsylvania coal or purchase it wholesale for less than Tupelo is paying for its power purchased wholesale from the T. V. A. But while the Tupelo system supplies electricity to the people at the yardstick rates, or at rates based upon the cost of generation, transmission, and distribution, the power company is wringing overcharges from the people of his district, including the conscientious gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, amounting to more than 100 percent, as I shall show before I close.

The difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and me is that he goes to the power company for his information, and I go to the official record. That was the report of the power company which he read from.

Mr. RICH. Here it is. Read it. It is authentic.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not care to read it; it is not official, and the gentleman knows it is not official.

Mr. RICH. It is sworn to and filed with the Speaker of the House.

Mr. RANKIN. I used the record of the Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin for a brief question.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Does not the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia regulate the utilities and control the rates? If that be so, is the gentleman indicting the New Deal which has had control of the Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia for the last 7 years?

Mr. RANKIN. I decline to yield further. The gentleman from Wisconsin does not want information on this subject, but I will give him some a little later, on the way his people in Wisconsin are robbed with overcharges for electricity to the amount of more than $20,000,000 a year.

As a matter of fact, we were trying to pass a law along the lines of the British law, which would make the Potomac Electric Power Co. give back part of their earnings to the consumers every year and at the same time cut their dividends down in proportion, until they got these rates down to their normal levels. They complied, in a way, so far as the rates were concerned, but they completely dodged the issue so far as their dividends were concerned. A few men who own this concern, or actually one man, draw down enormous rake-offs every year. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stood here and said they have all this property, when the truth is the consumers in Washington have paid for it many times. Well, suppose I own a house and lot in Williamsport, Pa., the gentleman's home, and that house is worth $5,000.

Mr. RICH. Woolrich.

Mr. RANKIN. Or in Woolrich, his home town, and I rent it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Suppose I have him tied so that he cannot get a house anywhere else, just as the power company has these folks all tied up, both here and in Pennsylvania. They not only cannot get power anywhere else, but they have to pay whatever rates are imposed.

Suppose the gentleman cannot get a house anywhere, and I charge him $1,000 a year rent. Then suppose I come to him and say, "I am going to raise the rent on that house to $5,000 a year." He might ask, "What are you going to do with it?" I say, "I am going to build another house with it and I am going to rent it to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] for $1,000 a year." Of course, it would all be mine.

That is exactly what this outfit has done here. They have taken from the people of the District of Columbia all this money, and, instead of putting it into rate reductions, they have gone out and reinvested it for themselves, and now call it a part of their rate base.

They remind me of the New Zealand savage William J. Bryan used to tell about who claimed title to a piece of land on the grounds that he had eaten the owner.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will read the statement I shall put in the RECORD, he will find they never paid more than 10 percent and they have only done that in the last 2 or 3 years when there has been the undistributed profits tax. Most of the time they paid 5, 6, or 7 percent. If the gentleman will read that tomorrow morning he will know more about it than he does now.

Mr. RANKIN. I hope I will never be that gullible.

When I hear a man get up here and read something, and finally discover he is reading from a statement made by C. W. Kellogg, I feel that he is more to be pitied than blamed.

I promised the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] a little kindergarten education on power rates in Pennsylvania, so I am going to move up to his district. I want to say again that I love the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I resent the effort of these utility people to take him off on a snipe hunt and mislead him.

Mr. RICH. I want to say to the gentleman that no public utility or anybody else will take me on a "snipe hunt," not even the gentleman himself. I will take care of myself and I will not ask the gentleman or anybody else to look after me.

Does the gentleman mean to take me on a "snipe hunt"? No one can do that with me; I can take care of myself, and I ask no help from any of my colleagues.

Mr. RANKIN. I said these utilities propagandists had evidently taken the gentleman on a "snipe hunt." I did not do it. Do not blame me for it.

Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] that under the last rates published by the Federal Power Commission, as shown by this book I have here, which gives the rates in every community in the United States, and which I am trying to get published as a House document, so as to have these rates in your hands, because you are going to need them, every one of you, this summer and this fall—it shows that 40 kilowatt-hours of electricity in Tupelo, Miss., costs $1; in Cleveland, Ohio, where they have a municipal plant, $1.27; and in Williamsport, Pa., the biggest town in the gentleman's district, and in all the other towns in that area, the cost is $2.57. In Tupelo, Miss., 50 kilowatt-hours a month costs $1.25; in Williamsport, Pa., and throughout that area, $3.12. In Tupelo, 100 kilowatt-hours a month costs $2.25; and in Williamsport, Pa., and surrounding area, $5.04. In Tupelo 250 kilowatt-hours a month costs $4.25; in Williamsport, Pa., and surrounding area the cost is $8.34, and so forth.

These rates apply to all the towns in that area. The country people in his district pay more, if they get any electricity at all.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not have time. I only have a few more minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. RANKIN. I cannot get any more time, the gentleman sees that.

Mr. RICH. I will try to get the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman cannot do it. They have men in the House here to block me. I am sorry, I cannot yield.

Mr. RICH. Nobody will block you from getting time.

Mr. RANKIN. They have tried it already, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. Speaker, I want to set out a comparison between the light and power rates in the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the rates in the District of Columbia, and the rates in my home town of Tupelo, Miss.

You will note that this list includes not only Williamsport, the largest city in the gentleman's district, but also Woolrich, his home town. Here are the rates in effect in all the above cities and towns, compared with the rates in Tupelo, Miss.

Mr. RICH. But you forget to tell them that the power that you are getting down at Tupelo is paid for by the people in my district, because the Government is doing that, and they are being taxed, and they are paying for the power you are using down there. You get it for less than it costs the Government to furnish it to you in Tupelo, Miss.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I will answer that statement in a moment.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I just want you to show in that 5 minutes, if you will, how much taxes the T. V. A. is paying to any State or any county or anybody else for what they are doing and getting for nothing, and I can show you that every public utility, just like the Potomac Electric Power Co., pays half of their earnings into the Government for taxes. Instead of that, you fellows down there are resting on the Government, and we in Pennsylvania are paying the bill to run the T. V. A. and the Government; and that is where you have the advantage of us, because you have got the Government in business down there.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the conscientious gentleman from Pennsylvania will have to get a better answer than that when he goes back to face the people in his district and has to confess that every single human being in his district who buys his electricity from the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co.—and that means practically all of them who use electricity—have to pay an overcharge ranging from 100 to 300 percent.

He tries to tell you that the power companies in Pennsylvania pay taxes and that the municipal light and power system in Tupelo does not. In that he has been misled again, for the municipal plant at Tupelo pays proportionately more money in lieu of taxes for the amount of electricity sold than does any power company in Pennsylvania.

Then he tries to make you believe that Tupelo is buying power from the T. V. A. below the cost of production. There he has been misled again. Tupelo pays on an average of a little more than 5 mills a kilowatt-hour for her electricity, while the Alabama Power Co. transmitted power into my district last year and sold it for profit to a private power company at 4.1 mills a kilowatt-hour.

The Louisiana Power & Light Co. generates power, transmits it into the State of Arkansas, and sells it wholesale to the Arkansas Power & Light Co. for profit at 2.6 mills a kilowatt-hour, or a little more than one-half the rate paid by Tupelo when it buys power wholesale from the T. V. A.

But let me bring the gentleman from Pennsylvania a little nearer home, and call his attention to the fact that last year the power generated at the Conowingo Dam on the Susquehanna River was sold at wholesale for profit at 3.34 mills a kilowatt-hour. The Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. can purchase power, or generate it with Pennsylvania coal anywhere in the State at less than 4 mills a kilowatt-hour. Then it certainly ought to be able to distribute it at the same rates the city of Tupelo distributes her power for which she pays 5 mills a kilowatt-hour.

If that were done, the average householder in the gentleman's district would save more than 100 percent on his light and power bill, and the commercial consumer would save anywhere from 175 percent to 300 percent; while a small industry using 200,000 kilowatt-hours a month would save about $700 a month. One using 400,000 kilowatt-hours would save $2,300 a month; and one using 1,000,000 kilowatt-hours a month would save $3,200 or more than $37,000 a year, on its electric power bill—and the people of the whole State would save $72,000,000 a year.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania intimates that this drive to get electricity to the American people at what it is worth is socialism; when, as a matter of fact, it is the greatest movement toward individualism this country has seen for generations. It is building up the homes, the mercantile establishments, and the small industries of the Nation and making this country a better, a brighter, and a richer place in which to live.

God speed the day when we can convert men like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], enlist their enthusiastic support, and bring the blessing of cheap electricity to the people of the entire Nation, including the now helpless consumers in Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE CIGAR INDUSTRY

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have come to the Well of this House today to plead with you to let my people work. The cigar industry, which had its beginning in my county—York County, Pa.—150 years ago, and which has built towns and communities and afforded a high standard of living for many thousands of people, is rapidly coming to a close because of the recent legislation passed by this House. Just this week several more factories have been forced to close. Not only the community is suffering in this, but the Federal Government, too, will suffer.

The local internal-revenue office of Red Lion reports that in 1939 cigar stamps were sold there for 253,270,518 cigars. Wherever cigars have been sold in recent years the name of Red Lion suggested itself and immediately people thought of cigars, and more cigars—once good, honest, 5-cent cigars. Not only did the cigar industry mean prosperity in the communities in which the factories were located but to the surrounding country for miles and miles around. Good times or bad times depended on the cigar industry. I am inviting the membership of this House to drive up into my county, just 100 miles away from here, and see what a community has been built up by this industry, with its large banks, churches, schools, and substantial homes.

Red Lion Borough, incorporated 60 years ago, built out of cigars, has the highest percentage of population attending Sunday school of any community in the United States. They have never allowed liquor to be sold in the town. They have set up a standard of morals and living generally that has never been surpassed anywhere. And now the wage and hour law is forcing these factories to close. There was a time not long ago when an adjoining borough had more than 40 cigar factories, some of them employing several hundred people. Today, if I am rightly informed, there are only 2 or 3 in operation. Would you believe me when I tell you that this town must be a ghost town in the near future?

Recently a cigar manufacturer who had been in business for many years was compelled to pay to his employees wages, due under the new act, totaling $2,900. Mr. Heindle issued these checks to his employees and all of the 38 employees walked into his office and laid their checks on his desk, refusing to accept them. This speaks for the feeling of the people in the community. This is concrete evidence of the good will existing between the employees and the employers.

Another factory that recently closed posted a lengthy statement in their plant calling to the attention of the workers that because of the existing wage and hour law they were compelled to close their factory. And they did close on February 23. They definitely set forth in the statement that they had a market for cigars and that they wanted to continue to operate, and that just as soon as the liberty and freedom they had enjoyed throughout a period of years was given back to them they would open up their business and reemploy every one of their old employees.

I am asking this House if it is going to stand idly by and see community after community like this with thriving industry be blackened out by a destructive piece of legislation when it could be prevented by simply amending the law. I am asking you again why you will not let my people work?

I am reliably informed that recently when several of these factories closed the workers flocked to the unemployment agency 10 miles away to find the place overcrowded and many of them had to go back to their homes and return the next day to report. True it is that many of them are not earning much money, but they are willing to work for what they are earning and they will make their earnings keep them rather than be on relief. Years ago I read a book—I have even forgotten the title—but it concerned starving people in Ireland, and about all I remember of the book was that the writer said, "What has poor Ireland done that England will let the people starve?" I am asking this House and particularly the New Deal Members here, "What have my people done that you refuse to let them work and earn an honest living?"

There never were any labor troubles in the cigar communities until 1933, when due to recent legislation supported by rubber-stamp politicians a group of outside troublemakers, principally from New York and Philadelphia, came into the county and created a strike. The strike so disrupted business that the machine began to come and then finally hundreds of people were clinging to the last straw—working and willing to work for what they could earn.

We find the present vicious law severing that last straw, and I am here today pleading for those people and again asking this House why in the name of God and humanity you will not let my people work?

[During the delivery of the foregoing the following occurred:]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I did not yield for a speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and this will be taken out of the gentleman's time.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 13½ minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, speaking under a special order, if I start a sentence and have not finished it before someone demands that the words be taken down, have I the right to finish that sentence so as to make the meaning clear?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALTER. Can the Speaker of the House of Representatives make a declaratory judgment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts if the gentleman from Pennsylvania states a parliamentary inquiry and he also doubts very much whether the gentleman from Michigan states a parliamentary inquiry, because the matter to which the gentleman refers has passed beyond the present stage of discussion.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It may come up later.

The SPEAKER. If it does, the Chair will then rule upon it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then I would not be accused of ignoring the ruling of the Chair if I act in good faith?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan under special order of the House is now entitled to 13½ minutes. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I endeavored to make it clear that the hearings before the Smith committee had disclosed a situation which shows that the Labor Board had gotten into such a position that it is no longer useful. That is, that the confidence of the people throughout the country, in that Board, had been destroyed, also that this investigation before the Smith committee had shown that the law itself should be amended. At that point in the discussion I was asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK] who resides in the northern peninsula of Michigan, and who is the only Democratic Member of this body from his State who resides in that peninsula, why the Smith committee should continue those hearings, if the statements I had made previously were correct. It was then my duty and I endeavored to show to the satisfaction of the gentleman from northern Michigan, who is a Representative in this House and lives in the northern peninsula, why the committee should continue. The investigation has already proceeded so far, if the newspaper reports are true, that the committee itself is now proposing amendments, is getting ready to make what is known as a preliminary report, which would embody those amendments.

The investigation of that committee has disclosed to the membership of the House and to the country that we have ample evidence showing the necessity for the abolition of the Board, for the amendment of the law, but there may be somebody here and there throughout the country or there may be some Member of the House who is not satisfied, and so, in order to satisfy that individual or that Member of the House or to remove from the mind of this one man or two men, if there were two, a doubt if one existed, and to show that there is not longer any doubt about what we should do, the Smith committee obtained another $50,000 and intends to continue its investigation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. RAYBURN. I wanted to give the gentleman in one moment my version of why the committee desires to proceed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But I did not ask the gentleman. I was trying to tell my version. My version is just as I said, that the committee intends to continue so that no longer can anyone doubt the necessity of making these moves. I recall, in my childhood days, that there was a doubting Thomas who wanted to put his finger in the wound on our Saviour's side so he would know that Christ had been crucified. Thomas would not accept the testimony of the other disciples but demanded that he be shown. I do not have any criticism of any Member of the House, or anyone on the outside, who wants to wait until the last bit of evidence that can be produced has been produced before making up his mnd. On the other hand, if the rest of us are satisfied, then there is no reason why we should not act.

As an illustration, you will recall that the Smith committee found in the files of the Board a memorandum by Mr. Witt, Secretary of the Board, which told of a visit which he was asked to make to Pittsburgh on the 2d day of June 1937, there to meet Lee Pressman, general counsel of the C. I. O., and Philip Murray, vice president of the C. I. O., in order that they might make a demand upon the Inland for a signed contract, something which the Supreme Court had said, back in April of 1937, need not be made in oral form.

Now, suppose I doubted that that memorandum was in Witt's handwriting. Suppose I claimed that that document was forged. Then there would be the question whether it was forged or not.

Now, we are all familiar, I think, with the proposition that it takes expert testimony to determine whether an instrument has been forged or not. We have had books written on that subject. So if I were in doubt, even though Mr. Witt came in and admitted that he made it, even though Mr. Mayne came in and admitted that the document, the authenticity of which was questioned, was forged, still I might thing that Mr. Witt or Mr. Mayne was laboring under a misapprehension and might be mistaken, and I might want to wait until there had been further evidence from the F. B. I. The average citizen who heard the testimony in the Smith hearing knows we need a new Board—that the law should be amended.

So perhaps this committee is going on and on and on until they have convinced by overwhelming testimony the last doubting Thomas.

I suppose you noticed in the papers that the committee was going to bring out a preliminary report, and the newspaper reporters have been speculating as to the amendments which were to be proposed by the Smith committee. After the Smith committee brings out this report—suppose it brings it out this week—that report will be referred to the Labor Committee of the House. We have the statement of the chairman of that committee, through the papers at least, that no action will be taken until the final report of the Smith committee is brought out. When is that going to be? Does anyone know? We will go along until the latter part of March or the first of April. Then if it is referred to the Labor Committee of the House it must be there 30 days, must it not, before you can get it on the floor of the House by petition? The papers also state that two gentlemen from Georgia, who are Members of this House, intend to bring out a discharge petition if the Committee on Labor does not act. But, as I said before, that will take 30 days after the report of the Smith committee has been submitted to the Labor Committee of the House of Representatives. Certainly this House will give the Labor Committee a few days, perhaps a week or 2 weeks, to consider that. Then we will be getting down to the end of the session.

The appeal that I have made is this, that inasmuch as we know now, the majority of us, that this law should be amended, inasmuch as the Congress intends sometime to get rid of that Board, and the only way you can get rid of the Board is to repeal the act and pass legislation creating a new Board, enacting such provisions as you want to, the only way that can be done being by some sort of petition similar to that which these two gentlemen from Georgia are quoted as stating they intend to circulate, why is it that the Republicans who advocate a change of this law should sit here and wait for the majority to act, if we really want that act amended? Why should we not sign this Petition No. 23 that I put on the Speaker's desk some time ago and bring out the bill which I introduced in March of 1939 and get it on the floor of this House? Then throw it into the wastebasket, if you wish, or propose any amendment you wish, but insure that the House at least, regardless of what the Senate may do, will propose amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, and abolish the Board.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Being a member of that Labor Committee I believe that their procrastination is just a part of the determination on the part of the leadership not to get anything out of that committee. With all of the pressure that is being exerted on us, I believe they are determined not to bring anything out, but what they are trying to do is to discredit the Smith committee, and it is the most popular committee today of any committee of Congress.

Mr. HOFFMAN. All I can say today is that three Members of the House Committee on Labor have signed Petition No. 23, that the House Committee on Labor has been holding hearings for more than 10 months, that this subject has been up for 2 years; and if there has been delay, this delay should be charged to the majority side. If there is no inclination shown to bring out this legislation, then from this time on the lack of doing something instead of talking about doing something can be charged to the majority side; and there is no reason for us to let the majority circulate their petition and steal our thunder.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question because of his intense study of the Wagner Act, the wage-hour law, and the work of the Labor Board. In the gentleman's opinion—and I realize this is only an opinion but I am asking it because I think the gentleman's opinion will be as good as that of anyone in the House—in the gentleman's opinion will this present session of Congress be permitted to consider amendments to the wage and hour law or the Wagner Labor Relations Act?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I have no way of knowing. The answer to that rests with the majority unless we of the minority come up here and get together within striking distance by the signing of petition No. 23. If we do, then we can say to those on the majority side who really want the law amended: "Now, come on, boys, we have 150 signatures to this petition; you come up now and sign." If they refuse then there is evidence that there is no real desire to amend the law. I do not know any other way to bring it out other than by a discharge petition.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; I yield to a member of the Committee on Labor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman stated that three members of the Committee on Labor had signed petition No. 23.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Would the gentleman also inform the House of the approximate number, if not the exact number, of Members who have signed it?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I have never looked at it since I filed it with the Clerk. I am not going around begging anyone to sign any petition. I made the simple announcement that the petition was there and its purpose, and I assume that every Member of the House will exercise his own good judgment whether he wants to sign it or not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The reason I ask this question is because I have received so many letters from Democrats and Republicans operating industries in my district asking whether the Congress will be permitted to consider the matter at this session.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know. That is within the control of the majority leadership and I have no way of knowing what their program is.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. Does not the gentleman feel that much of the criticism that is made of the National Labor Relations Board is the result of the manner in which the act has been administered?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Much of it, yes.

Mr. WALTER. The Judiciary Committee last year reported almost unanimously a bill that would provide judicial review of decisions of administrative agencies. Does not the gentleman feel that the prompt enactment of that bill would at least hang something over the heads of these administrators so that they would attempt to carry out the clearly expressed intent of Congress?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I intend to vote for that bill and do everything that I can to get others to vote for it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STEARNS of New Hampshire indefinitely.

WITHDRAWAL OF RESOLUTION

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday I filed House Resolution 404 through a misunderstanding. I am advised by the Parliamentarian that it cannot be withdrawn except by action of the House. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules be discharged from further consideration of House Resolution 404 and that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Texas will be granted.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio speech delivered by myself.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE LITTLE RED SCHOOLHOUSE

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a letter I have received from the Detroit Federation of Teachers and my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues in the House, I want to speak today for a few minutes on the subject of the little red schoolhouse. Ably it has been said that when Abraham Lincoln was a boy the schoolhouses were red only on the outside. I want to cast no reflections generally upon our American system of education, nor the many thousands of loyal school teachers in our Nation, but I do say to you that it should be a matter of grave concern to us all—not only to Members of this House but to all citizens of the United States—that we see to it that no taint of pink stains the pure whiteness of our great system of education [applause] which made this the greatest Nation on earth.

If stories that we hear have any foundation, many of our educational institutions are not only at present afflicted with a pink stain, but in some cases this stain verges on red. In any event, in my opinion, it is time that this Congress—that the people who elect us, as well as the boards of education and the regents of universities in this Nation—see to it that our teachers hereafter spend more time teaching Americanism and the principles of religion and less time expounding doctrines of un-Americanism and in criticism of our traditional American institutions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am aroused by a letter which I received Saturday from the Detroit Federation of Teachers, at the top of whose letterhead there is this slogan, "Democracy in education—Education for democracy." The letter is signed by Mr. Philip H. Nichamin, chairman, legislative committee.

I do not know who Mr. Nichamin may be. I have been informed by the Bureau of Naturalization of the Department of Labor today that according to their records there was born in Minerk, Russia, in 1875, one Henry Nichamin who became a naturalized American citizen December 4, 1912, and lives in Detroit. According to the records at the time he was naturalized, he had two sons—Sammy and Heinie—born in 1906 and 1909, respectively. I do not know whether Mr. Philip H. Nichamin is either of those sons.

Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest respect in the world for the Detroit schools and Dr. Frank Cody, who has been the superintendent of schools in Detroit for many years. I do not know how many of the Detroit teachers belong to the Detroit Federation of Teachers, Local 231, 4612 Woodward Ave. But I sincerely hope that none of the teachers of Detroit subscribe to, and have had any part in, the drafting of the letter I received and which I shall introduce a little later in my remarks. If they do so subscribe, I feel that they have not been put in possession of the facts or have been deliberately misled in opposing the various measures mentioned in this letter. But if they do so subscribe, after having been put in full possession of the true facts and having fully understood what is in each of the bills mentioned, then I say to you, Mr. Speaker, they are not worthy of the solemn responsibilities entrusted to them as teachers of American youth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read this letter received from Mr. Nichamin, together with my reply.

THE DETROIT FEDERATION OF TEACHERS,
LOCAL 231, THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS,
Detroit, Mich., February 29, 1940.

Representative FRED BRADLEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BRADLEY: As workers and educators, we are alarmed by the flood of antialien bills now pending in Congress. We are alarmed by the implications and the potential abuses of such legislation. We are convinced that civil rights, like peace, are indivisible: when the rights of any section of the population are threatened, so are the rights of the rest.

Education for democracy cannot be realized if teachers' rights are to be endangered. Furthermore, there is precedent and logic which indicates that restrictive legislation, such as the antialien bills, are weapons against the rights of working people, and especially against those in the ranks of organized labor.

We ask you to use your influence in defeating all such legislation, and particularly the following: The Stewart bill (S. 2830), the Smith bill (H. R. 5138), the Dempsey bill (H. R. 4860), the Hobbs bill (H. R. 5643), the Reynolds bills (S. 1979 and S. 1980).

We hope that you will give our plea your consideration.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP H. NICHAMIN,
Chairman, Legislative Committee.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1940.

THE DETROIT FEDERATION OF TEACHERS, LOCAL 231,
4612 Woodward Avenue, Detroit, Mich.

(Attention Mr. Philip H. Nichamin, Chairman, Legislative Committee.)

GENTLEMEN: I acknowledge and thank you for your favor of February 29th objecting to certain so-called antialien bills now pending in Congress.

I have every sympathy for an alien. I have every sympathy for the oppressed peoples of certain other nations of the world. However, so far as I have been able to determine, we have not as a Nation ever established recruiting stations abroad soliciting immigration into the United States. Generally speaking, on the other hand, our doors have always been open to aliens. They must, however, realize that in coming to the United States of America they must be determined to and desirous of living under our form of government, under our ideals of government, and under our principles of government. When this is not so, as far as I am concerned, they are no longer to be desired in this country. There is nothing in the Constitution of this country which teaches that it should commit suicide while shielding within its folds, and under its protection, those who would bring about its destruction.

Each of the several bills mentioned in your letter is designed to protect the Constitution of the United States and the loyal American citizens who live under its cloak. It is the intention of these bills to restrict the activities only of undesirable aliens. I shall support each and every one of those measures that have that aim in view.

Very truly yours,

FRED BRADLEY, M. C.

Mr. Speaker, verily it is time that the people of America awaken lest under influences and philosophies such as these promulgated by Mr. Nichamin turn the Little Red Schoolhouse into a Big Red Schoolhouse. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]?

There was no objection.

SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF THE NEW DEAL

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time simply to express my extreme disappointment as I expected to listen to some remarkable speeches today in honor of the seventh birthday of the New Deal. I want to express my very great disappointment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address I delivered before the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of Washington on last Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article from the pen of Paul Scharrenberg, entitled "Washington, the City Beautiful," which is a reprint from the American Federationist.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a table showing the spending of American Presidents as published on January 6 in the New York Sun.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER]?

There was no objection.

ACQUISITION OF CERTAIN ISLANDS IN THE CARIBBEAN

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago on this floor I called attention to the decision of Pan American Airways in canceling the east-bound stop at Bermuda on the flight to Europe due to the British seizure and censorship of mail.

In connection with this matter I quote from a recent Detroit Free Press editorial:

There is some talk in London about the "theoretical right" of a belligerent to "hail the clippers above the high seas and force them down and search them for contraband."

The possibility that something of this sort may be attempted has been suggested from the start, but practical difficulties and hazards in the way of undertaking it exist.

And there are other reasons why, it is to be hoped, the British will not undertake anything of the sort.

The forfeiture of American friendliness and good will which might be a result, particularly in the event of some untoward and perhaps fatal accident, would be a loss far greater than any possible gain from the practice.

I have introduced in the House this afternoon a resolution looking toward the acquisition of certain British islands in the Caribbean and British Honduras. The President is asked to enter into negotiations in any manner as may be deemed appropriate.

An identical resolution has been introduced in the other body this afternoon by the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and I am sure that his grasp of the situation will be reflected in appropriate remarks which he no doubt will make before the Senate on this proposal.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. There has been a good deal said about this matter in the newspapers. Why should not the gentleman's resolution be seriously considered with a view to liquidating some of the British war debt payments which are now due us?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is exactly what I propose to do. It would be in part payment for the indebtedness which the British Government owes the United States. That would be the basis for the negotiations.

Mr. FISH. In view of the fact they are not paying interest on the debt, why should we not get it for some of the interest payment immediately?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think the gentleman's suggestion is splendid. I am pleased to have his support of my resolution.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]?

There was no objection.
